You and I know, too, that it is important that the country possess within its borders a necessary diversity and balance to maintain a rounded national life, that it must sustain activities vital to national defense, and that such interests cannot be sacrificed for passing advantage.

Judging from what has followed, the above was just another Rooseveltian promise gone wrong, but the logic of the President's statement remains sound today, even though his determination to carry it out has gone the way of all flesh and most administrative policies. On February 2, 1935, this same Executive authorized a 50-percent reduction in the duty on manganese. This has resulted in greatly increased imports from Brazil and Russia. This has given great aid to the Communists in Russia in securing money and resources with which to rape Finland, and it has played into the hands of American steel monopolists owning manganese mines in Brazil, but it has done nothing, surely, to help develop the great South Dakota manganese deposits or to strengthen our national defense by providing America with a self-sufficiency in manganese which is readily available.

Steel today is enjoying a tariff rate which is in reality a subsidy to the steel industry. A subsidy, if you please, paid in large part by the American farmers, who, instead of having a tariff rate which works as a subsidy, have their own tariff protection chopped away steadily and stealthily by the reciprocal-trade agreements. Restoration of the manganese duty, cut under the trade agreement, means only 7 cents added to the cost of an average ton of steel. It need result in no added charges on the cost of finished steel products. All that domestic manganese producers ask is treatment for manganese on a parity basis with steel products.

South Dakota can be depended upon to supply manganese ore in peacetime or wartime. South Dakotans will spend their returns from manganese purchases with American producers and manufacturers. South Dakota has manganese enough to supply the needs of America for years to come provided an American tariff policy is adopted and American capital is given a chance to produce manganese in an American commonwealth. Let us discontinue this subsidy of foreign nations and pass this amendment which will give protection to Americans at home.

I regret that the "gag" rule invoked by the Democratic leadership precludes adequate debate of this amendment. I hope you will adopt this important national-defense measure. I am gratified by assurance that the Republicans in the House will support it 100 percent. I urge you Democrats to put patriotism above party in at least this one important instance and help us pass this amendment. Should it fail of passage here, I trust it will be added to any reciprocal-trade legislation which may pass the Senate following our disposition of this resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Dakota.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. RISK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RISK: Page 1, line 8, strike out the period, substitute a colon, and insert the following: "Provided, however, That no goods, whether subject to the provisions of any existing trade agreement between the United States and a foreign nation or hereafter entered into, shall be received for entry into the United States unless accompanied by a manifest which has affixed thereto a certificate by an American consul that the goods represented by such manifest have been produced in accordance with the provisions of sections 6, 7, and 12 of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938. (Public, No. 718, 75th Cong.)."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Rhode Island.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RISK) there were—ayes 98, noes 122.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the resolution back to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration House Joint Resolution 407, to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, directed him to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution do pass.

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Massachusetts rise?

Mr. TREADWAY. To offer a motion to recommit which is at the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. TREADWAY. I certainly am.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman qualifies. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

MOTION TO RECOMMIT

Mr. TREADWAY moves to recommit the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 407) to extend the authority of the President under section 350 of the Tariff Act of 1930, as amended, to the Committee on Ways and Means, with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith with the following amendment: Line 8, before the period, insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That no such foreign trade agreement concluded after the date of the enactment of this joint resolution shall take effect until it shall have been approved by the Congress by law: Provided further, That so much of said section 350 as suspends the application of section 516 (b) of the Tariff Act of 1930 (relating to appeal or protest by American producers) to any article with respect to which such foreign trade agreements have been concluded, or to any provisions of such foreign trade agreements, is hereby repealed: Provided further, That the authority conferred under said section 350 does not embrace authority to include in any trade agreement the excise taxes upon the importation of petroleum, coal, lumber, and copper imposed by subchapter B of chapter 29 of the Internal Revenue Code: Provided further, That no rate reduction shall be included in any foreign trade agreement which permits the entry into American markets of products of workers, farmers, or miners of foreign countries at total landed costs, all tariff duties paid, which total costs are less than the cost of production or wholesale selling price of competitive products of American workers, miners, or farmers where such American products are commercially available."

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. TREADWAY. On that, Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 163, nays 222, answered "present" 3, not voting 37, as follows:

SENATE

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who dost sustain man's spirit by an undying hope, satisfy us early with Thy mercy, for we would come to Thee while the day is young and life is full; we would choose Thee with all the kingdoms of the world before us and in preference to all the treasures of knowledge or the pleasures of sin. Do Thou quicken in us this true resolve, and hearken to the prayers of our hearts, which come in highest moments when we think not of ourselves but only of Thee.

Throughout this day do not Thou forget us nor release the hidden thread that binds us to our duties and our tasks. Help us with pure hearts and minds to live so honestly and fearlessly that no outward failure can dishearten us or take away the joy of conscious integrity. So may we strive in all things to render loyal service to our country and to Thee, our God, who art ever calling us to be followers of Him whose cross will one day win the world, even Jesus Christ Thy Son, our Lord. Amen.

Mr. JOHNSON of California presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of California, which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation:

Senate Joint Resolution 4

Relative to memorializing Congress to take action in respect to the existing emergency in the Tulelake district

Whereas the continued rising of the waters in the Tulelake sump has broken dikes and flooded thousands of acres of valuable land in the Tulelake district of the Klamath reclamation project; and

Whereas a permanent menace exists on account of the continued rising of these waters which threatens a rich agricultural area producing millions of dollars' worth of agricultural products; and

Whereas it appears that this menace can be averted and this condition remedied by the construction of a tunnel, and that a self-liquidating project has been devised for the construction of such tunnel; and

Whereas it appears that said project has been approved by the Federal agencies having jurisdiction over the matter, and that the expenditure of an estimated $974,773 would construct the necessary works to drain the area involved, rectify the present condition, and remove a continuing menace to a valuable agricultural area: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and the Assembly of the State of California jointly, That the Congress of the United States is hereby respectfully urged to enact such legislation as may be necessary to provide for the construction of all necessary drainage and flood-control works in the Tulelake district of the Klamath reclamation project and to make available funds for the construction of said tunnel project; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded by the secretary of the senate to each Senator and Representative in Congress of the United States from California.

Mr. JOHNSON of California also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of California, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

Assembly Joint Resolution 9

Relative to discrimination in steamship service and freight rates between New York and California ports to the Panama Canal Zone

Whereas Congress has authorized the construction of additional locks at the Panama Canal at an eventual total cost of approximately $277,000,000, as well as an additional expenditure of approximately $35,000,000 for the construction of barracks, airports, etc.; and

Whereas large quantities of foodstuffs, materials, and supplies are imported annually into the Republic of Panama amounting in the year 1937 to $21,828,000, of which imports from the United States amounted to $11,377,000 principally from the Atlantic seaboard; and

Whereas materials and supplies will be imported into the Panama Canal Zone in large quantities as additional protection for national defense by the United States Government and for the Republic of Panama, including alfalfa, groceries, cold-storage products, drygoods, dairy products, raw materials, housewares, candies and tobacco, milk and cream, shoes, cattle and hogs, soaps, meats, lard, vegetables, lumber, petroleum products, cement, iron and steel, automobiles, chemicals, medicines, reinforced concrete frames and floor slabs, hollow tile filler walls, stucco exterior, tile and composition roofing, miscellaneous iron and steel, hollow metal work, metal lath and plaster, steel shelving, automatic refrigeration systems, waterproofing, cold-storage rooms, slate toilet partitions, glazed tile wainscoting, ceramic, cement and other quarry products, tile floors, paint, plumbing, electric fixtures, and various other types of materials and supplies grown, produced, and manufactured on the Pacific coast; and

Whereas the United States Government owns and operates the Panama Railroad Steamship Co., which is operated under the direction of the President of the United States and the War Department, which operates steamship service between New York and the Panama Canal Zone, and railway service between Atlantic and Pacific ports of the Canal Zone; and

Whereas freight rates upon said Government-owned line between the Atlantic seaboard and the Panama Canal Zone are materially less than freight rates on private lines operated between Pacific coast ports and the Canal Zone, in some cases being as much as 50 percent less; and

Whereas if similar service and the same freight-rate basis were provided by the United States Government between Pacific coast ports and the Panama Canal Zone, California growers, producers, and manufacturers of supplies and materials to be used in said construction work, including the necessities of life, to be imported into the Republic of Panama as hereinabove set forth, would be in a position to compete with growers, producers, and manufacturers on the Atlantic seaboard; and

Whereas due to the withdrawal of ships under the jurisdiction of the United States Maritime Commission from export trade due to the war, there are now numerous vessels available for this service; and

Whereas private steamship lines operating between the Pacific coast ports and the Panama Canal Zone will not meet the New York-Panama rates of the Government-owned Panama Railroad Steamship Co., resulting in a practical monopoly in favor of shippers from the Atlantic seaboard to said Panama Canal Zone: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the President of the United States, the Congress and the Secretary of War are hereby respectfully requested to take such action as will be necessary to provide similar steamship service between Pacific coast ports and the Panama Canal Zone and at the same freight-rate basis in order that Pacific coast growers, producers, and manufacturers may be enabled to compete with growers, producers, and manufacturers on the Atlantic seaboard in supplying agricultural and manufactured materials and supplies to the Panama Canal Zone; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted by the Governor of the State of California to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House, to the Secretary of War, and to each Senator and Representative from California in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON of California also presented the following joint resolution of the Legislature of California, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry:

Assembly Joint Resolution 14

Relative to the continuance of Japanese beetle suppression under Federal auspices

Whereas a hearing has been called by the United States Bureau of Entomology and Plant Quarantine for February 27, at Washington, D. C., to consider whether or not that Federal agency shall continue to enforce regulatory measures to prevent the spread of the Japanese beetle within the United States, said agency having capably and effectively carried on this function for many years; and

Whereas the abandonment of enforcement of quarantine against the Japanese beetle by this Federal agency will cause such enforcement work to be assumed by the several States, thereby encouraging the development of 48 different kinds of quarantine measures, and will require greatly increased costs for the same objective; and

Whereas the Federal authorities have complete machinery already established and are in better position to conduct necessary investigational and research work relative to control and nursery inspection and certification techniques; and

Whereas the fullest protection to be afforded the agricultural industry against the rapid spread of one of the world's most serious fruit, crop, and garden pests appears best to be accomplished by an experienced and trained Federal agency: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California does hereby urge that there be no abandonment of quarantine enforcement, nursery certification, control methods, research, or procedures directed to Japanese beetle suppression by the Federal Government, and that the present Federal agency be requested to continue the effective work now in progress; and be it further

Resolved, That Congress be requested to make adequate financial provision for Japanese beetle suppression; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded, by the secretary of state, to the United States Secretary of Agriculture, the Chief of the United States Bureau of Entomology and Plant Quarantine, and the Senators and Congressional Representatives for California.

INTRODUCTION OF A BILL—PETITION OF THE NATCHEZ TRACE ASSOCIATION

Mr. BILBO. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill for appropriate reference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be received at this time. The rules of the Senate provide that, in their order, petitions and memorials, committee reports, and bills and joint resolutions shall be received; so the Chair is compelled to ask unanimous consent that the Senator be permitted at this time to introduce his bill for proper reference. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I was much in accord with the announcement made by the able leader on the Democratic side a few days ago that unanimous consent would be withheld in the matter of making speeches upon the introduction of bills. If that is the purpose of the able Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BILBO], I shall have to object. A little later, I will say to the Senator, when the routine morning business shall have been concluded and we reach the unfinished business, he may have as much time as he pleases.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is heard, and therefore the bill cannot be introduced at this time.

Mr. McNARY. No, Mr. President; I have no objection to the introduction of the bill. What I want to prevent is taking unnecessary time in making a speech in support of a bill which is introduced; that is all. If it is the mere introduction of a bill, I have no objection.

[There being no objection, Mr. BILBO introduced Senate bill 3436, which was referred to the Committee on Claims and appears under the appropriate heading "Bills and joint resolutions introduced."]

Mr. BILBO. In addition to introducing the bill, I ask permission to present a resolution, in the nature of a petition to the Congress, passed by the Natchez Trace Association of Mississippi at a convention held in January 1940. I ask unanimous consent that the petition be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the resolution or petition was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolution

This resolution made, seconded, and passed by the Natchez Trace Association of Mississippi, this 24th day of January A. D. 1940.

Whereas under date of November 30, 1939, an unobligated balance of $1,660,884.85 of Federal funds was available for construction of the Natchez Trace Parkway in Mississippi, and because of these unobligated funds, the Director of the Budget has recommended to the United States Congress that only $2,000,000 be appropriated for parkway construction for the fiscal year 1941 and that the sum of $700,000 be allocated from this appropriation for use in connection with the Natchez Trace Parkway (Mississippi's share being $483,776); and

Whereas since the date of the Budget's recommendation the State of Mississippi has conveyed to the United States Government 50.48 miles of Natchez Trace rights-of-way for which approved contract plans call for an immediate expenditure of about $2,000,000, which is approximately $339,115.15 more than the funds which are available; that, in addition to the rights-of-way recently conveyed, the State of Mississippi is prepared to acquire and convey to the Federal Government approximately 35 more miles of Natchez Trace rights-of-way by June 1, 1940, and the United States National Park Service, in connection with the Public Roads Administration, can immediately obligate an additional $1,400,000 of Federal funds for grading and drainage work; that, as during the year of 1939, the Federal and State agencies in charge of the Natchez Trace Parkway have completed the mapping and surveying of the major part of the trace route through the State, if sufficient funds are made available by the United States Congress, the future of the parkway can progress very rapidly; and

Whereas the financial situation for Mississippi's part is as follows:

Balance, Nov. 30, 1939		$1,660,885
Grading lettings Dec. 29 on "L" and Jan. 5 on "M2"		803,385
		852,500
Bridge lettings Jan. 25 on "W"		167,545
		684,955
Grading lettings Feb. 15 on "D" estimated		350,000
		334,955
Grading letting about March on "N" estimated		350,000
		−15,045

"J" ready for grading in April, $430,000, grading money needed during 1941 fiscal year for "D2," "H," and "M2" bridges on "D," "K," "L," and "N," stabilization to protect expensive subgrade and base for future permanent paving on "M," "L," and K"; and

Whereas a finished roadway with no major intersections and infrequent minor intersections from Nashville, Tenn., to Natchez, Miss. (where a bridge across the Mississippi River is almost completed) would be of great military value in event of war; and

Whereas in certain sections of the State through which the parkway traverses local residents have suffered from crop failures caused by both drought and flood and the winter months have brought on unusually severe snows and freezes, causing death and disease to cattle and other livestock, and there exists in these localities a very serious unemployment situation; that the continuance of Natchez Trace developments will provide immediate jobs and work for these people who are in dire need of temporary relief.

Now, therefore, the Natchez Trace Association of Mississippi hereby petitions and recommends to the United States Congress that an appropriation of $5,000,000 be made for the development of the Natchez Trace Parkway for the fiscal year of 1941.

ROANE FLEMING BYRNES,
President, Natchez Trace Association of Mississippi.

TWO HUNDREDTH ANNIVERSARY OF UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I introduce, for appropriate reference, a joint resolution, the purpose of which is to authorize the establishment of a United States University of Pennsylvania Bicentennial Commission providing for the representation of the Government and people of the United States in the recognition of the two hundredth anniversary of the founding of the University of Pennsylvania by Benjamin Franklin, and the beginning of university education in the United States.

Mr. President, I hope this resolution will receive favorable consideration. It is a tribute to an outstanding institution of learning in the United States and a leader in many fields of endeavor. Among the total enrollment of over 17,000 in all its schools are young men from all parts of the world and from all sections of the United States. Its Wharton School of Finance and Commerce is the accepted leading undergraduate school of finance and commerce in the world. Through its doors have come prominent citizens who have contributed greatly to the fields of business, government, liberal arts, law, medicine, and other sciences. It has ever been loyal to the standards and principles of its founder, Benjamin Franklin. The people of Pennsylvania and of the United States want to reaffirm once again, on this two hundredth anniversary, their allegiance to the sound principles of Franklin, and to build on them an even richer heritage for the future.

I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution and a letter from President Thomas S. Gates, of the University of Pennsylvania, be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 214) authorizing the recognition of the two hundredth anniversary of the founding of the University of Pennsylvania by Benjamin Franklin and the beginning of university education in the United States, and providing for the representation of the Government and the people of the United States in the observance of the anniversary was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Library, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate Joint Resolution 214

Joint resolution authorizing the recognition of the two hundredth anniversary of the founding of the University of Pennsylvania by Benjamin Franklin and the beginning of university education in the United States, and providing for the representation of the Government and people of the United States in the observance of the anniversary

Whereas there are to be held at Philadelphia, Pa., and at other places during the year 1940, celebrations commemorating the two hundredth anniversary of the founding of the University of Pennsylvania by Benjamin Franklin, said institution being the first university to be established in what are now the United States; and

Whereas in accordance with resolutions of the president and fellows of the University of Pennsylvania, there will take place in Philadelphia, Pa., on the 16th, 17th, 18th, 19th, 20th, and 21st of September 1940 formal ceremonies of celebration of the bicentennial, in the presence of the governing boards, faculties, students, and alumni of the university, the delegates of other institutions, distinguished guests, and a large number of friends and benefactors; and

Whereas the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the city of Philadelphia will be officially represented at the ceremonies; and

Whereas the University of Pennsylvania endeavors to foster and maintain the ideals of truth and freedom so dear to Americans: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Government and people of the United States unite with the University of Pennsylvania in a fitting and appropriate observance of the two hundredth anniversary of its founding, which marked the formal beginning of university education in the United States (Harvard, William and Mary, and Yale were founded before the University of Pennsylvania, but they were not universities until after the University of Pennsylvania became a university).

SEC. 2. There is hereby established a Commission to be known as the United States University of Pennsylvania Bicentennial Commission (hereinafter referred to as the Commission) to be composed of 15 commissioners, as follows: The President of the United States and 4 persons to be appointed by him, the President of the Senate and 4 Members of the Senate to be appointed by said President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives and 4 Members of the House to be appointed by said Speaker.

SEC. 3. The Commission, on behalf of the United States, shall cooperate with representatives of the University of Pennsylvania, the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and the city of Philadelphia in the appropriate observance of such anniversary, and shall extend appropriate courtesies to the delegates of foreign universities and other foreign learned bodies or individuals attending the celebration as guests of the University of Pennsylvania.

SEC. 4. The members of the Commission shall serve without compensation and shall select a Chairman from among their number, but the President of the United States shall be designated the "Honorary Chairman" of the Commission.

SEC. 5. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000 to be expended by the Commission for expenses, including actual and necessary traveling and subsistence expenses, incurred while discharging its functions under this resolution. The Commission shall have power to select, hire, and fix the compensation of such officers and employees as shall be necessary for the performance of its duties without regard to the provisions of other laws applicable to employment or compensation of officers or employees of the United States.

SEC. 6. Any vacancies occurring in the membership of the Commission shall be filled by the President of the United States.

The letter presented by Mr. DAVIS is as follows:

UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA,
Philadelphia, February 22, 1940.

The Honorable JAMES J. DAVIS,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: As you undoubtedly know, the University of Pennsylvania is celebrating its two hundredth anniversary this year. The celebration began on the occasion of Benjamin Franklin's birthday, January 17, when we had as our guests His Excellency the French Ambassador, M. Rene Doynel de Saint-Quentin, Justice Owen J. Roberts, and ex-Senator George Wharton Pepper.

The main celebration will take place during the week of September 16, and the concluding ceremonies will be held on Friday, September 20, and Saturday, September 21. During this week symposia, meetings, convocations, etc., will be held, and the university will be hosts to a distinguished gathering of college presidents and leaders in the educational and scientific world.

The purpose of this letter is to ask if you will give favorable consideration to the introduction of a bill into the present session of the Congress providing for the appointment of a United States University of Pennsylvania Bicentennial Commission.

On the occasion of the Harvard Tercentenary a commission was appointed to represent the Government at the tercentenary celebration, and it consisted of President Franklin D. Roosevelt as honorary chairman and four gentlemen appointed by the President. These were Maj. Gen. Dennis E. Nolan, United States Army, retired, War Department; Admiral William H. Standley, Chief of Naval Operations, Navy Department; Dr. Frank P. Graham, president of the University of North Carolina; Dr. Robert G. Sproul, president of the University of California.

Of the Senate were appointed Hon. John N. Garner, Vice President; Hon. Marcus A. Coolidge; Hon. Robert J. Bulkley; Hon. Frederick Hale; Hon. Henry W. Keyes.

Of the House were appointed Hon. William B. Bankhead, Speaker; Hon. John J. O'Connor; Hon. Richard M. Russell; Hon. Richard B. Wigglesworth; Hon. Robert L. Bacon.

For your information I am attaching herewith a copy of the resolution which the Congress of the United States adopted in connection with the Harvard Tercentenary.

It should be pointed out, I believe, that the University of Pennsylvania was the first university in the United States. Harvard, William and Mary, and Yale were founded before the University of Pennsylvania, but they were not universities until after the University of Pennsylvania became a university.

We are, of course, asking the Pennsylvania State Legislature to adopt resolutions calling for commissions to represent the State of Pennsylvania at our bicentennial celebration, and the city of Philadelphia will also appoint a commission.

We are very hopeful that the Congress of the United States will take favorable action, and we are asking you as senior Senator from the State of Pennsylvania to be kind enough to sponsor the introduction of such a resolution before the Senate.

A resolution to be presented before the House is being prepared under the supervision of the Honorable CHARLES A. WOLVERTON. It will be a joint resolution presented by all the graduates of the University of Pennsylvania who are serving in the House. These gentlemen, in addition to Representative WOLVERTON, are J. PARNELL THOMAS, LEON SACKS, ALBERT G. RUTHERFORD, PIUS L. SCHWERT, and JOHN E. SHERIDAN.

Your interest in our behalf will be greatly appreciated, I assure you.

Cordially yours,

THOMAS S. GATES, President.

The Assistant Administrator shall perform the duties and exercise the powers of the Administrator, in the event of the absence or sickness of the Administrator until such absence or sickness shall cease, and, in the event of a vacancy in the office of Administrator until a successor is appointed.'

"SEC. 2. Section 2 (a) of said Act is hereby further amended by adding at the end of said section the following:

" 'The office of the Administrator of the Bonneville project is hereby constituted an office in the Department of the Interior and shall be under the jurisdiction and control of the Secretary of the Interior. All functions vested in the Administrator of the Bonneville project under this Act may be exercised by the Secretary of the Interior and, subject to his supervision and direction, by the Administrator and other personnel of the project.'

"SEC. 3. Section 4 (b) of the said chapter is hereby amended by striking out the words and figures 'January 1, 1941' wherever they occur therein and by substituting in lieu thereof the words and figures 'January 1, 1942'."

ORDER DISPENSING WITH CALL OF THE CALENDAR

The VICE PRESIDENT. The routine morning business having been concluded, the consideration of bills on the calendar under rule VIII is in order.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the calling of the calendar be dispensed with.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR DEPARTMENTS OF STATE, COMMERCE, JUSTICE, AND THE JUDICIARY

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 8319.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 8319) making appropriations for the Departments of State, Commerce, and Justice, and for the judiciary, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that it be read for amendment, the amendments of the committee to be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Tennessee? The Chair hears none. The clerk will proceed to state the amendments of the committee.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the heading "Title I—Department of State—Emergencies arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service," on page 17, line 3, after "U. S. C.", to strike out "42" and insert "22", so as to read:

Contracts entered into in foreign countries involving expenditures from any of the foregoing appropriations under the caption "Foreign intercourse" shall not be subject to the provisions of section 3741 of the Revised Statutes (41 U. S. C. 22).

POLL TAXES

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I wish to direct the attention of the Senate to a vital question having a significant bearing upon our democratic institutions.

Recently, I am informed, the Department of Justice has inquired into the question of so-called poll taxes in several States, with a view to determining whether they constitute an infringement of the civil liberties of citizens under the Constitution of the United States.

It is my understanding also that some Members of Congress are drafting legislation to outlaw such taxes, and that we may be called upon to consider such legislation before the present session ends.

The question of poll taxes assumes particular interest in my own State of Pennsylvania, since our Republican-controlled general assembly only last year set in motion the machinery for the reestablishment of such a tax.

This tax, which was in effect for many years, led to such corruption and wholesale vote buying that it was overwhelmingly voted down in 1933, when the people of Pennsylvania amended their constitution in order to get rid of it.

In all countries and in all ages the poll tax has had a dishonorable history.

Such a tax was levied in the year 4 B. C. by the Emperor Caesar Augustus, and it was imposed upon conquered peoples as a badge of servility.

Among the payers of this poll tax were Joseph and Mary, who went up to Bethlehem to be enrolled as taxpayers.

Its history, however, dates even beyond that, for we find that in ancient Greece the philosopher Aristotle called it "a most ignominious imposition, which none but slaves paid to tyrants."

In England, more than 500 years ago, Wat Tyler led the peasants in a bloody rebellion against the poll tax.

The revolt was put down, but it achieved its purpose. Restrictions upon suffrage were gradually relaxed.

All poll-tax requirements of any kind were finally abolished in England in 1698, and they have never been restored.

The British brought the tax to America in 1663, and it prevailed throughout the Colonies until the Revolution.

In fact, this tax was one of the grievances of the colonists against the Crown; and North Carolina's revolt against it resulted in the Mecklenburg Declaration of 1775, a forerunner of the Declaration of Independence.

The Revolutionary fathers abolished the poll tax as one of the first and most important steps toward democracy, and it did not reappear until after the War between the States.

The movement for repeal of these taxes was launched more than two generations ago, with Maryland taking the lead; and today the tax remains in effect in only eight States.

It is a fact that the poll tax restricts suffrage. In the 9 States which had poll taxes in 1936 there were 12,472,000 persons of voting age, but only 334,590 votes were cast.

In 6 other States without poll taxes, having approximately the same number of persons of voting age, there were 9,817,094 who voted.

The 1936 vote for the Nation as a whole showed that only 24 percent of the eligible electors voted in the poll-tax States, as compared with 72 percent in the remaining 40 States.

When Florida abolished the poll tax, subsequent to the 1936 election, there was a phenomenal increase in the number of voters, as my friend the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] can testify.

The plain fact is that the poll tax makes it possible for cliques dominated by wealthy and often absentee property holders to control politics and elections.

This is a serious threat to the South. For with the infiltration of northern capital has come northern political influence—an influence designed to yoke the South in economic subjection by keeping great sections of its people in political thralldom.

It is futile to contend that the poll tax gives the elector a stake in government. Instead, the poll tax leads to the atrophy of democratic process, and the so-called stake becomes an ironic jest when precinct committeemen pay the tax in order to buy the vote.

In Pennsylvania the fight against the poll tax was begun nearly 70 years ago, in the constitutional convention of 1873, when it was attacked as a relic of our monarchial and aristocratic origin.

The fight was not ended until 1933, and by that time, according to the editorial columns of the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin, the tax had degenerated into a meaningless and expensive nuisance.

Despite the fact that the entire history of poll taxes in Pennsylvania had been marked by corruption and vote fraud, an attempt was made to restore the tax at the 1937 session of the general assembly. Members of the Republican minority sponsored the measure, which was blocked by the Democratic majority.

In 1939, with a Republican majority in the legislative saddle, the situation was different. A resolution to restore the poll-tax provision to the constitution was introduced by Dr. George Woodward, millionaire Republican State senator from Philadelphia, who shamelessly admitted he was acting as a spokesman for the underprivileged rich. The senator also admitted at the same time that he thought "we have too many voters." It was estimated that in his own district more than 5,000 voters, most of them his political opponents, would have been disfranchised by the Woodward measure—and may yet be if the proposal is approved once more by the legislature and accepted by the electorate.

This action could not have been taken by the Pennsylvania General Assembly without the connivance of Governor Arthur James, who controls it jointly with ghost governor Carl Estes, and Estes' boss, Joe Pew. It was a bold move to turn the clock backward in Pennsylvania; to thrust down the people's throats a discredited and repudiated relic of monarchy. Its practical purpose was to disfranchise the underprivileged; to deny them one of the greatest and most inalienable rights of citizenship.

When the Republican National Convention, as anticipated and announced, rededicates itself to fundamental American principles at Philadelphia this June—and I might add that such rededication is very much in order for a party leadership that has strayed so far from the principles of the founding fathers—it would do well to drop a hint to Joe Pew and Moe Annenberg, that their Harrisburg representatives strangely belie those fundamental principles in advocating a poll tax.

It is my hope that the Supreme Court will strike down all poll-tax qualifications throughout the Nation, in order that money may, nowhere in this Republic, be a prerequisite to full citizenship.

It is my belief that the Congress of the United States, so far as it be within its power, will do its utmost to achieve this end.

The poll tax is the negation of democracy, the basis of election fraud and corruption, and the root of much social and economic distress. It should be abolished throughout the United States—now and forever.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. TOBEY. Mr. President, I rise to offer a resolution, and I wish to speak about 4 or 5 minutes on it.

I hold in my hand the recent annual report of the Comptroller General of the United States. Much of its contents is of necessity in the form of tables of figures and statistics, but the prose of this report presents a picture of a situation which is a challenge to each of us.

The present Comptroller General comes from my State, and is a former Member of this body. He is a man of integrity and frankness, and the latter quality is evident in his report.

The Congress created the Office of Comptroller General for the manifest purpose of having an independent agency to see to it that all expenditures by the various units of our Government were within the authority of the law. It provides as follows:

[The United States Code, title 31, ch. 2]

AUDIT AND SETTLEMENT OF ACCOUNTS

Section 72: Same; settlement of accounts. Accounts shall be examined as follows:

First, the General Accounting Office shall receive and examine all accounts of salaries and incidental expenses of the Office of the Secretary of the Treasury, and all bureaus and offices under his direction, all accounts relating to the Custom's Service, public debt, Internal Revenue, Treasury, and designated depositaries, mints and assay offices, Bureau of Engraving and Printing, Coast Guard, Public Health Service, public buildings, Secret Service, and to all other business within the jurisdiction of the Department of the Treasury, and certify the balances arising thereon to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Officials of the Internal Revenue have explained to me that it is difficult to give a definition of the term "audit" that would apply to all forms of auditing. Their interpretation is that to audit means to examine and to verify to the fullest extent possible under the circumstances of a particular case; wherever physical examination is possible, they regard this as a requisite of a real audit, and so do I.

That the work of the Comptroller General's office has tremendously increased is clear from the record of the volume of items presented for audit. But it is not with these that I am concerned.

I wish to read the foreword from the Report of the Comptroller General of the United States, as follows:

In making to the second regular session of the Seventy-sixth Congress the following report of the work of the General Accounting Office for the fiscal year 1939, as required by section 312 (a) of the Budget and Accounting Act, approved June 10, 1921 (42 Stat. 25), it should be stated that my responsibility for the work of the General Accounting Office began April 11, 1939, at which time the work during more than three-quarters of the fiscal year had already been performed under the direction of the Assistant Comptroller General of the United States.

So that the responsibility of Comptroller General Brown in his incumbency of this great office, as he himself sets forth, covers only the period from April 1939 to the beginning of the last fiscal year, which was July 1, 1939.

I am concerned, and seriously so, over the truths which the Comptroller General tersely sets forth. Let me read his own language. On page 101, chapter 4, under the heading "Financial statements," he writes:

The statements comprising this chapter are "matters relating to the receipt, disbursement, and application of public funds." They bring to the attention of the Congress, as fully as the accounting records of the Government make possible, information regarding the public funds on deposit in the Treasury of the United States and in other depositaries authorized by law, the value of gold and silver holdings of the Government, accounts receivable in isolated cases, investment holdings of the Government, all as reported, but not verified by audit by the General Accounting Office; and miscellaneous loans receivable reported in isolated cases but not verified by audit. In opposition to the assets there are set forth items representing certain ascertained liabilities, commitments in the form of appropriations, special deposit funds, and trust funds. Among such items are the exchange stabilization fund, which is exempted by law from audit by the General Accounting Office; public debt, the transactions of which have not been audited by the General Accounting Office; special deposit accounts and depositary accounts of Government corporations and agencies, many of which have not been audited by the General Accounting Office; and balances to the credit of disbursing officers, as to some of which the audit by the General Accounting Office is not current.

Each of the items contained in the statement (exhibit A) is described in some detail in the following paragraphs and is supported by statements on which comments deemed pertinent have been made:

I am reading now from the Comptroller General's Report under the paragraph—

GOLD UNENCUMBERED (SCHEDULE A–1)

This item shows the book value of gold unencumbered as recorded on the records of the Treasurer of the United States and shown to be in the custody of the superintendents of the several mints, assay offices, and Fort Knox, Ky.—

Listen, my colleagues—

Verification or physical inspection has not been made by the General Accounting Office.

So, according to the statement of the Comptroller General, the fact remains that the unencumbered gold in those different depositories, of a total value, according to the report of the Treasury, of $2,318,856,396, has never been examined physically and verified to exist.

I come now to—

SILVER UNENCUMBERED (SCHEDULE A–2)

This item states the book value of silver on hand as shown by the records of the Treasurer. The quantities held in Washington were verified by the General Accounting Office by actual count during the fiscal year 1938 and were at that time placed under seal in the vaults of the Treasury.

The Comptroller General is referring to that part of the silver which is in Washington. He continues:

The bulk of the silver, however, and as per his schedule A–2, the value of this is $615,085,905, is in the custody of the superintendents of the mints and assay offices and such quantities have not been verified by actual count.

We come now to the subdivision—

CASH—TREASURY OFFICES (SCHEDULE A–3)

This item reflects the cash (coin, currency, etc.) in Treasury offices as shown by the books of the Treasurer of a value of $34,131,730. No actual vertification of this amount has been made by the General Accounting Office.

DEPOSITARIES (SCHEDULE A–4)

This item reflects the amount on deposit with Federal Reserve banks and approved depositaries as recorded on the books of the Treasurer. The General Accounting Office has made no verification on this account.

ACCOUNTS RECEIVABLE (SCHEDULE A–5)

This item represents the amount of receivable items carried on the books of the Treasurer as being in the process of collection and has not been verified by the General Accounting Office.

On page 105 of this report he states:

NATIONAL DEFICIT

This item reflects the difference between the assets and liabilities as shown by this financial statement, and is subject to adjustment on account of several items such as the realizable value of the assets, particularly foreign obligations receivable under schedule A–8; accounts receivable of many type not included in the statement because of lack of reliable information; tax levies due and uncollected; whatever net worth may be applied to the Tennessee Valley Authority; and for other reasons of similar importance. The amount, therefore, should be considered only as a basis for adjustment of all of the elements when they become known.

If anything in printer's ink ought to be expressed by the algebraical expression "X," as an unknown quantity, the Comptroller's report is entitled to that distinction.

Where does this leave us? It leaves the Nation with a figure dollar balance of the value of gold bullion, silver, cash, and so forth, of billions of dollars. But that is all we actually know.

No one knows whether the gold, the silver, the cash, the bonds, and securities which are the actual assets behind the bookkeeping figures are in the several depositaries or not.

Of course, we all believe they are. There is no reason to suspect they are not.

But no actual audit or physical examination and verification has been made by the Comptroller General or any other independent accounting agency.

It is almost unbelievable, yet it is true.

Now, let us consider a little further into the situation. Our Government, and rightly so, sets up high standards for business which comes under its purview and demands their maintenance, but in the matter of its own wealth, measured in cash, gold, silver, bonds, and so forth, it is unbusinesslike and loose.

Who in this Chamber has so short a memory that he does not recall the tragedy which took place in the management of a large corporation a couple of years ago? The statement of that corporation's finances was an admirable one, insofar as the figures setting forth its assets went. But when some earnest accountant had the courage to go behind those figures and look into the actual assets as represented by inventory of merchandise, they found those assets seriously impaired and largely nonexistent.

Loss and shame accrued to all responsible therefor.

I would be the last to suggest that anything akin to that is present in connection with these Treasury assets, but I submit that we have a duty and responsibility in this matter which stands out clearly, and that is to take steps at once to have a physical examination and verification of the gold, silver, cash, receivables, and bonds which are Treasury assets and expedite this matter.

This report is a challenge to the Senate.

The nonexistence of any definite knowledge and verification is an amazing revelation.

It is a sin of omission.

As trustees for the people we cannot pass this by.

Such a situation cannot be permitted to continue.

To that end, Mr. President, I offer a resolution, Senate Resolution 238, as follows:

Whereas it is provided in section 312 of the Budget and Accounting Act, 1921, that the Comptroller General "shall investigate, at the seat of government or elsewhere, all matters relating to the receipt, disbursement, and application of public funds"; and

Whereas in that part of the annual report of the Comptroller General for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1939, which relates to such matters it is stated that information is presented "regarding the public funds on deposit in the Treasury of the United States and in other depositaries authorized by law, the value of gold and silver holdings of the Government, accounts receivable in isolated cases, investment holdings of the Government, all as reported, but not verified by audit by the General Accounting Office"; and

Whereas it is further stated in such report that the item "Gold unencumbered" shows only the book value of such gold "as recorded on the records of the Treasurer of the United States and shown to be in the custody of the superintendents of the several mints, assay offices, and Fort Knox, Ky.," and that "verification or physical inspection has not been made by the General Accounting Office"; and

Whereas such report further states that the item "Silver unencumbered" shows merely the book value of silver on hand as carried on the records of the Treasurer, that the General Accounting Office verified by actual count in 1938 the part of such silver held in Washington, but that the bulk of the silver, which is in the custody of the superintendents of the mints and assay offices, has not been so verified by actual count; and

Whereas the report further states that no verification has been made by the General Accounting Office of the amount of cash in Treasury offices or the amounts on deposit with Federal Reserve banks and approved depositaries, and that the records of the Treasurer of the United States and the Office of Commissioner of Accounts and Deposits with respect to the investment holdings of the Government are not complete; and

Whereas it is essential in the public interest that full and complete information shall be available to the public at all times with respect to the actual amounts of gold, silver, securities, and other assets of the Government, and that a proper audit shall be made of the accounts of the various agencies which have custody of any such assets, including the verification of the assets themselves: Therefore be it

Resolved, That a special committee of five Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, is authorized and directed (1) to make a full and complete study and investigation of the manner of auditing the accounts of the various agencies which have custody of Government assets (including gold, silver, coins, currency, and securities), and the failure of the General Accounting Office to verify the assets referred to in the annual report of the Comptroller General for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1939, as not having been verified; and (2) to report to the Senate thereon, together with the method which, in the opinion of the committee, is best calculated to insure an impartial and independent audit of the accounts of all agencies which have custody of any of such assets, including the proper verification of such assets by actual count or otherwise. The committee shall report to the Senate as soon as practicable, but not later than 60 days after the date this resolution is agreed to, the results of its study and investigations, together with its recommendations, if any, for necessary legislation.

For the purposes of this resolution the committee, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to hold hearings, to sit and act at such times and places during the sessions, recesses, and adjourned periods of the third session of the Seventy-sixth Congress, to employ clerical and other assistance, to require, by subpena or otherwise, the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such correspondence, books, papers, and documents, to make such investigations, to administer such oaths, to take such testimony, and to incur such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic services to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of the committee, which shall not exceed $15,000, shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I suppose the resolution just read by the Senator from New Hampshire will be referred to the appropriate committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution (S. Res. 238) will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR THE DEPARTMENTS OF STATE, COMMERCE, JUSTICE, AND FOR THE JUDICIARY

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8319) making appropriations for the Departments of State, Commerce, and Justice, and for the judiciary for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, what is the amendment now pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment is the first amendment of the committee, on page 17, line 3, after "U. S. C.", to strike out "42" and insert "22."

The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Contributions, quotas, and so forth", on page 18, line 1, after the figures "$1,722.57", to strike out "Bureau of Interparliamentary Union for Promotion of International Arbitration, $20,000, including not to exceed $10,000 for the expenses of the American group of the Interparliamentary Union, including personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, traveling expenses, purchase of necessary books, documents, newspapers, periodicals, maps, stationery, official cards, printing and binding, entertainment, and other necessary expenses to be disbursed on vouchers approved by the president and executive secretary of the American group."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I trust the amendment at the top of page 18 will not be agreed to. It is a small item of $20,000, which has for many years been appropriated by Congress, one-half of which is a contribution by the United States to the maintenance of the Interparliamentary Union, an international organization that is more than 50 years old. This $10,000 appropriation to the maintenance of the Interparliamentary Union is an important item in its budget. The other $10,000 is to contribute toward the payment of the expenses of the American group in attending the conferences of the Union. I understand the committee struck out this item on the theory that there might not be any conference of the Interparliamentary Union this year, but whether there will be a conference this year may depend on whether the war in Europe continues for the remainder of the year. However, whether there is a conference this year or not, the Union must be maintained. It has certain expenses which it has to meet. It has a general secretary. It has offices which have to be maintained. Recently I received from the secretary of the Interparliamentary Union a letter in which it is stated that even though there should be no general conference this year, due to the European War, it is contemplated that there will be group conferences among the representatives of the nations not at war, or perhaps even some of those at war, looking toward the preparation of the ground for ultimate peace among the nations of the world.

If there is no general conference, and if there is no American delegation, there will be no expense, and the money will revert to the Treasury. So no harm could come from the appropriation of $20,000 for the purposes stated in the provision. I think it would be most unfortunate at this particular time to eliminate this small item for the maintenance of an organization which during the past half-century has contributed to the development of the theory of cooperation and better understanding, economic as well as political, among the nations of the world. I think it would be especially unfortunate at this time to eliminate this appropriation and to announce to some 30 or 40 nations of the world that the United States Government is unwilling to spend the small sum of $20,000 a year to maintain this organization.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The personnel involved would have much to do with my point of view. Can the Senator tell me who is at the head of the American group?

Mr. BARKLEY. I shall be glad to answer the Senator. For a number of years I was president of the American group. A year ago a Member of the House of Representatives was elected. This year, in my absence and without my consent, I was again chosen as head of the American group. I urged that a Member of the House of Representatives be elected as head of the American group if the group were not willing to reelect the incumbent. They saw fit to elect me.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I wanted the Senator to make that statement, because, so far as I am concerned, that justifies the appropriation.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thank the Senator. However, I would not want the Senator's remarks to be interpreted to mean that anyone who has ever been the head of the American group was not worthy of the appropriation being made by the Congress.

This item is a small matter. I do not even like to take the time of the Senate to discuss it; but it seems to me the item should be retained. I do not know whether or not there will be a conference this year; but if one is not held, the money will not be spent. If there is one, the American Republic ought to be represented; and the small amount of $10,000 is a contribution toward the payment of the expenses.

The appropriation has never paid all the expenses. Anyone who goes as a delegate pays out more money than he receives from the $10,000; but the appropriation aids in defraying the expenses of those who go. Last year at Oslo there was a large delegation. Many of the delegates paid their own expenses, or had only a small part of their expenses reimbursed to them. However, not all the Members of the Senate and the House are in a position to go on these missions and pay their expenses out of their own pockets.

The committee has eliminated the item as a measure of economy. I am in sympathy with that viewpoint, and I shall help to eliminate as much as I can to bring about as much economy as possible in order that, if possible, we may avoid a tax bill at this session, or raising the debt limit of the United States. However, I do not think the $20,000 will contribute very much either to economy or to the avoidance of a tax bill.

Mr. ASHURST rose.

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. I shall take the floor when the Senator concludes.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I shall consume only a few minutes. I voted against retaining the item in the bill, and I wish to state my reasons for doing so.

I seriously doubt that anything has been accomplished by this organization. I have never been able to find out what has been accomplished. I went 1 year as a delegate; and after attending the sessions I was more than ever satisfied that the organization served no good purpose.

As a matter of fact, a meeting of the representatives of parliamentary bodies today to discuss international arbitration means a meeting of the few democracies. A representative will attend from Germany. How much power the representative of a parliamentary body in Germany would have to determine questions of international arbitration, Members of the Senate know. A representative from Russia will doubtless be present. How much power a parliamentary body in Russia has on a matter of international arbitration is open to question. The same thing is true of Italy. As a matter of fact, such a meeting means a meeting of representatives of France, Great Britain, and the United States.

The meetings are pleasant enough affairs. I listened to one or two speeches at the meeting which I attended. There were interpreters; and after the speeches were interpreted from French into German, and then into English, I concluded that the speeches were bad in any one of the three languages. [Laughter.] There were speeches by men who had no power to act. They could not accomplish anything. They could only speak. Everyone knew that they did not speak for the power in their countries, except as to the democratic countries.

I must say that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] made the only argument I know of in favor of the appropriation. If the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] is to be a representative, I greatly dislike to oppose the item. I should be in favor of sending him, because he has taken a great interest in the organization and is well equipped to perform some service.

When it comes to sending a delegation this year to meet with representatives of other parliamentary bodies, I ask, What representatives will they meet? The representatives of what countries will they meet to discuss international arbitration next July?

In the first place, I like the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], and I do not want him in the war zone this year. I do not want any other Member of the Senate over there. I know, too, that if they go over there we are likely to have some international complications. According to the press, last year, when the American delegation was abroad in August, the chairman of the American group—not the Senator from Kentucky, but the then chairman of the group, a Member of the other House—visited various foreign offices. We received daily information that the chairman of the American group was calling upon the Foreign Office in Berlin, the Foreign Office in France, and the Foreign Office in England; and about 1 week thereafter the war started. Judging by results, it was exceedingly unfortunate that we sent a delegation there for the purpose of encouraging international arbitration. However, I believe that the country was not as well informed on the subject as we were. Many were misled by the efforts on the part of the chairman in going to various foreign offices and attempting to conduct the foreign affairs of this country in that rather informal way. As a matter of fact, I do not believe the Congress had delegated any power to the chairman, nor had any instructions been given as to how far he should go in settling the affairs of Europe.

With the situation upon the sea as bad as it is, if Members of the Senate and House are sent across the water in the ships of other nations, and if one of those ships should be torpedoed, an international controversy would immediately arise. Mr. Welles is now traveling abroad representing the State Department for the purpose of discussing matters with foreign governments. If we should send a delegation from the Congress to discuss matters with representatives of the parliamentary bodies of Germany, Russia, and Italy, I cannot see that any good would be accomplished. I believe that this year we could afford not to make this appropriation, so that no gentleman would feel under obligation to go. If the money were appropriated, and Congress in that way should instruct the delegates to go, it would embarrass any Member of the Senate or House to refuse to perform this service for his country at a time of crisis in the affairs of the Nation. Such action should not be demanded of them. It might be misunderstood. If we should not make the appropriation, the secretary in this country would not have any negotiations to make, and there would be no occasion to pay a salary. Such a course would not save much money, but it would indicate that when it comes to a matter which involves the expenses of the Congress itself, we are willing to make a sacrifice and to do without contributing to this mission. Therefore we could economize on the executive departments with less hesitation than if we were spending this money, as I believe, unnecessarily.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BYRNES. I am through, unless the Senator desires to ask a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I merely wish to express my own opinion in relation to this matter. I was privileged to attend the conference held in Oslo last summer, and I wish to say to the distinguished Senator who has just spoken that, as I understand, Germany was not represented there, and neither was Russia, neither was Italy, neither was Japan.

My only purpose in rising to second the thought of the majority leader that the Senate retain and not strike out this $20,000 item is to suggest that, while the Interparliamentary Union does not consist of delegates who speak with authority from their governments, yet, nevertheless, it speaks with a certain degree of authority. We who were there met men of kindred minds—men who feel that parliaments mean something to the world. Fifty-odd years ago this organization came into being, and during that 50-year period America has contributed not only of her money to maintain the organization but has sent many of her fine statesmen to the meetings of the Union.

This morning it was my privilege to sit in the committee and hear the distinguished Secretary of State speak in behalf of the so-called reciprocity agreements. One of the points he made was, if the reciprocity agreements or authority to negotiate them is maintained in the President, that if and when the war ceases we will have an instrument which we can use to the benefit of our own country and all the other countries of the world. It seems to me that if the Congress should now snuff out this flame, when only ten or twenty thousand dollars are involved, it would be taking action detrimental to the cause of peace, if and when peace comes. It occurs to me that we should reinstate the $20,000 item and thus say not only to our own people but to democracies everywhere that we are in favor of parliaments and the parliamentary form of government; we are not going to let parliaments down, but are going to stand our burden or share of the expense of the Interparliamentary Union.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, this appropriation was considered and discussed both in the subcommittee and in the full committee. It was voted down in both by substantial majorities.

The theory, as I gathered it from the expressions of members of the committee, was that as our European neighbors are unfortunately engaged in war, it would be impossible to gather them together this year. If the war should be over by the middle of the summer, we would all be very happy, but the majority of the committee did not believe that it would be over in time for this organization to do any good this year, and we thought that the appropriation therefore should be omitted for this year.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, the Senator realizes that if there should be no conference the $10,000 that would go to the payment of expenses of the delegates would revert to the Treasury, and only the other $10,000, which is a permanent contribution to the maintenance of the union, would be expended.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true; $10,000 of the amount would not be used, but the other $10,000 would be used, and there was a considerable expression to the effect that a permanent appropriation of $10,000 a year to this organization would not be of very much, if any, value to the country. The majority of the committee took that view, and felt that certainly the amount should not be expended this year when probably no other nation would make a contribution and probably no meeting would be held. All we would be doing would be to contribute to the organization, and the committee was of the opinion that this amount ought to be saved. I think, under the circumstances, it should be saved, because I do not believe that either England or France will be able to send delegates to a meeting of the Interparliamentary Union this year; I am quite sure that Germany and Italy and Russia will not be able to do so; and I am quite sure that the Scandinavian countries will not be able to send delegates this year; in fact, I am quite sure that there will be no meeting of the union this year, and why we should appropriate this amount, under the circumstances, it is difficult for me to understand. It is a small sum, it is true. I regret exceedingly we cannot continue it, because of our distinguished leader on this side the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], who, as we all know, has been a very active member of this organization for some time.

I digress sufficiently long to say that, while I could not understand all the speeches made in languages other than English, the only speech that was very much to the point at the meeting which I attended several years ago was the one delivered by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, who make an excellent speech which won for him great applause and of which the American delegates were very proud. If it were on his account, if I thought there was any chance of his going over there this year, I would certainly be delighted to vote for the appropriation, but the committee has overwhelmingly taken the other view. I do not know what position they will take here on the floor, but in the committee overwhelmingly they took the other view, and there were only one or two votes, as I remember, in the subcommittee and only three or four in the full committee in favor of the appropriation.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. DANAHER. Does not everything the Senator says apply with equal force to the item on page 20, lines 15 and 16? Yet there the committee recommends an increase to $10,000 for participation by the United States in the International Labor Conference.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; the Senator is mistaken about that.

Mr. DANAHER. In what particular am I mistaken?

Mr. McKELLAR. The House decreased the amount that might be used for expenses of participation in the meetings of the International Labor Organization from $15,000 to $5,901, and the Senate committee restored $3,000. That is a different situation, although I doubt very much whether that appropriation can do any good.

Mr. LODGE. It is within the limitation, too.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes; it is within the limitation; there is no doubt in the world about that; and, furthermore, it was thought that this was of greater actual value to our country than the other appropriation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Would there be any more danger in delegates to the Interparliamentary Union going to Europe than members of the International Labor Conference? If this appropriation is to be denied because of the solicitude of our colleagues that we might find ourselves in danger zones, I wonder wherein the distinction lies between the value of our lives and the value of the lives of those who might attend some other conference for which an appropriation is made?

Mr. McKELLAR. The appropriation was not denied for that reason. It was denied because it was thought there would be no meeting.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am speaking of the reason assigned by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. If some representative of a labor organization on his way to the labor conference should go down in a ship, I myself doubt whether it would cause quite as much disturbance as if a Senator or a Member of the other House on their way to serve as delegates from this country should go down.

Mr. BARKLEY. Regardless of the disturbance that might be created, after all, the value of the life of a delegate to the other conference might be greater than that of anybody here.

Mr. BYRNES. Irrespective of whether the value of one life would be greater than another, if the Senator from Connecticut would move to strike out the other item, I would like to support such a motion and to strike both out.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not going to move to strike it out. I am talking about the relative importance of the two conferences as viewed by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BYRNES. I am very anxious to save the lives of Senators and Representatives.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, it would depend on where the Interparliamentary Union Conference would be held. I do not know where it would be held. If held in South America, it would not be dangerous for those attending, but it will not be held in South America, and I think it has been held in this country only twice in all the history of the organization.

I wish to say that the majority leader was good enough to appoint me a delegate to one of the meetings. I went to the meeting, and enjoyed it very much, but, for the life of me, how it had any effect in the world on any American question I was unable to determine, because all the other members of the conference talked wholly about European questions and not at all about American questions. I do not recall that any American question was raised until we heard the very eloquent and patriotic address delivered by our distinguished leader, than whom none can do better, as we all know. But no American question was involved, and nothing that concerned America was even discussed at the whole conference, if I understood all that took place, and I am not sure that I did. I make that reservation. I think unquestionably that this year the matter should be left as it has been left by the committee. The item should be stricken out. In 2 or 3 years I would be very glad to have our delegates confer with delegates from Europe, if it should be thought desirable, but I think this $20,000, while a very small amount, legislatively speaking, is at least that much money saved this year, and it will be found from an examination of the three appropriation measures contained in the one bill that there has been a very great deal of economy recommended by the Appropriations Committee in reporting the bill.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. May I say that those of us on the committee on the minority side support everything the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from South Carolina have said. It seems to me the record of accomplishment of the Interparliamentary Union is not of a character that can impress the casual student, and if there is any place where we can save the public funds it is on an activity of this sort at this time.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield the floor.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I am reluctant to enter this debate, and I shall remain in it but a short time. My diffidence in speaking on the amendment arises partly, if not wholly, from the fact that the item is opposed by such able Senators as the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], the chairman of the subcommittee having the bill in charge; by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], upon whose sagacity and judgment I long ago learned to depend; and by the able Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. As I say, their opposition gives me a certain diffidence in speaking on this subject; but, Mr. President, in view of all the circumstances I feel that this item should be retained.

I recall that in 1914, when Germany made an assault upon Belgium, and Belgium walked the Via Dolorosa that led to duty, death, and glory; and France, with a bravery and a resiliency beyond the range of eulogy, met the German impact, the United States Senate was ratifying so-called peace treaties. Those peace treaties were called breathing-spell treaties and were ridiculed by almost the entire world; indeed, many of our own most far-seeing statesmen ridiculed those peace treaties; but if those breathing-spell treaties had been applied, the stroke of apocalyptic vengeance which came upon the world in 1914 might have been averted.

Mr. President, when Prussian militarism was making its raid upon innocent and uncffending countries such as Belgium and France, it was Earl Grey who said, "The lights of Europe are going out." It looks now as if the lights of Europe are, indeed, going out. If they are, they will not be relumed within the liftime of any person now living. When these lights are going out, possibly not to be relumed within a hundred years, what a truly great act it would be for the United States, devoted to peace, to send, proudly, bravely, not on a warship but on a passenger vessel, its delegates to the Interparliamentary Union, if there should be one.

Mr. President, this conference has been called a gesture. It is, we will say, a gesture. Many years ago, I attended one of these Interparliamentary Union Conferences. I could not understand any language there spoken except the English. I could, now and then, catch a sentence of the French. No other language did I understand, but I had the consolation to know that, gibberish as some of the speeches sounded, those who made them were talking peace. Then a band played and the throbbing cellos and the bassoons sent out their notes, and every delegate knew what the band was talking about, because music speaks a universal language. That was one thing all delegates understood; and likewise the language of peace was understood because that is a universal language.

I do not want to smother the able majority leader [Mr. BARKLEY] with compliments, but I will say that he spoke ably at the Interparliamentary Union which I attended—it must have been 10 years ago. I did not presume to address the conference. I remember that another one of the delegates was a Member of the House of Representatives who has since achieved world-wide distinction and renown as a fearless, aggressive, and able leader, and is one of the most successful statesmen of our time, Fiorello H. LaGuardia. He delivered a superb speech; suggesting that reason and justice be applied in settling great questions.

Mr. President, I am reminded of an incident, in the history of Connecticut, which occurred probably 200 years ago. I do not know whether it was the town council or the town meeting that was in session. At that time there were no almanacs or radios to give news in advance of the occurring of an eclipse; but an eclipse came at midday. The sun was darkened; chickens went to roost; people were terrified. While the common council or town meeting was in session, somebody proposed to adjourn in order that the members might go to their own doom. One member, whose name for the moment I have forgotten, said, "No; if this be the end of the world, let us be found here doing our duty. Bring in candles," said he. Candles were brought in, and the town meeting or council proceeded with their work. The eclipse passed away, and light resumed its rule over the landscape.

So, Mr. President, if it be that the lights of Europe are to be extinguished—and it looks as if they may be—we are not going to intervene in any way. Europe must be the architect of its own destiny, for the destiny of a nation, like the destiny of a man, depends upon itself; and, as a man's salvation is wholly within himself, so is the salvation of a nation within itself. Europe will save itself only if and when Europe concludes that it has had enough of blood lust and ashes, and that there is a better forum than the supreme arbitrament of the sword in which to settle disputes.

So, Mr. President, I cannot find it in my heart to vote against this appropriation, although I commend the Senator from Tennessee for his efforts to economize. He has not singled out this item. I know that the Senator from Tennessee on many items, some of them affecting Arizona, has practiced economy, and it takes some courage to practice economy; but in the case of this particular item I believe that at this juncture we might let the world know that we are not intimidated; that we have not lost hope; and that, therefore, we will vote for a comparatively small sum to send some delegates to the Interparliamentary Union, there to discuss peace among the parliamentary governments of the world. Parliamentary governments are growing fewer and scarcer each month, and it seems to me we are the leader among parliamentary governments.

I close with the same note as the one upon which I began. I have made this speech with diffidence and with reluctance, as I say again, because the item is opposed by such superb intellects as the Senator from Tennessee, the Senator from South Carolina, and the Senator from Massachusetts; but I shall vote to sustain this appropriation, so that at least here a light may send out its lambent beams, even if it costs $20,000.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I am in accord with the action of the committee. I am not in accord with it on the basis of trying to save ten or twenty thousand dollars. That is not the basis of my support of the committee amendment. The amount is small. I am opposed to the item because I disapprove of the visitation to Europe at this time of a roving congressional delegation.

Like some of the others who have spoken, I went one year as a delegate to the Interparliamentary Union. I felt when I went that it would be a great thing; that in place of conferences between the executives of the nations there would be a conference between the legislative bodies of the nations. I very promptly found that the things which might have been of interest were eliminated. The first rule was that nothing of a controversial nature should be discussed. When the controversial issues are eliminated, a conference of this kind is emasculated.

I came to the conclusion that the Interparliamentary Union conference was a futile thing. I did not oppose it at that time because I had no objection to Senators and Representatives visiting Europe and making pleasant, friendly contacts within and without the conference; but having thought it was futile as a result of my visit, after observing what took place last year, I came to the conclusion that it would be dangerous rather than futile this year. We already have abroad in Europe a sufficient number of United States citizens without sending a group selected purely at the wish of some individual. I am glad to have Senators take a friendly, comfortable junket; but I wish they would find some other place than Europe this year. The expense is immaterial. Ten thousand dollars is of no concern. It is of concern if we send 10 or 15 or 20 Representatives or Senators into the battle-torn, hostile fields of Europe. I think it can result in no good, but only in evil. So I am opposed to this appropriation, because I think this an unfortunate time for American citizens, and particularly for those in official life, whose positions would be misunderstood and misrepresented if they should go abroad to make such a trip.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. I merely ask the Senator to permit me to say that in my main remarks I overlooked stating that I do not expect to be appointed as a delegate. I would deem it an honor to be appointed, but it would not be possible for me to accept.

Mr. ADAMS. If I thought the Senator from Arizona would be selected to go, I would withdraw any objection. [Laughter.]

Mr. ASHURST. It would not be possible for me to accept, for the reason that I have more miles of political fence down in my State than I find comfortable, and at the particular time when this Interparliamentary Union would meet I would not be in Europe, but I shall be in the geographical center of Arizona, attempting to put in order some fences which are now in a sad state of disrepair.

With all due deference to those able Senators who have opposed the amendment—and now, joined to the other Senators opposing the appropriation, comes one of the most superb intellects the West has produced in my time, the present senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], I shall support the item.

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Colorado yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. LUCAS. I understand that the Senator from Colorado has made one trip to Europe in connection with the Interparliamentary Union.

Mr. ADAMS. That is correct.

Mr. LUCAS. The Senator said something about this being a junket trip. Would he care to elaborate upon the word "junket," in view of his previous experience over there?

Mr. ADAMS. I do not believe it would be necessary. I will say to the Senator, in order to elucidate very briefly, that I went to the meeting in Paris, the year of the Paris Exposition [laughter] under the leadership of the majority leader of this body, along with the Senator from Tennessee. I had marvelous company. [Laughter.]

Mr. LUCAS. In all seriousness, Congress is frequently criticized, in the newspapers and by the people throughout the country, for what are called junket trips, and I should like to know, as one who has not been to Europe in connection with one of these Interparliamentary Union meetings, whether or not the Senator is really serious when he says that in his opinion participation by the American delegates is nothing more nor less than a junket trip.

Mr. ADAMS. I would not say it was nothing more nor less than a junket. I said that if there were to be junkets, there were other places far better this year than Europe for such a trip. I go so far as to say that I am very glad to have Senators and Representatives go about at Government expense, broaden their horizons, become more familiar with international affairs, and bring information back to Congress. I do not care how much pleasure they may get out of such trips. I am perfectly willing to see funds established for so-called junkets, if they have an educational aspect. The particular trip now proposed, in this particular year, I think would be fraught with danger, and I say that because of the experiences of last year.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it not possible that the same experience might be had this year that was had on one previous peregrination of the American delegation to the Interparliamentary Union, which in 1914, under the leadership of the late Dr. Bartholdt, of Missouri, started out with a great flourish of trumpets to a meeting of the Union, with the avowed purpose of bringing about permanent peace, and preventing war? When they were in the middle of the ocean on the way to Europe they received word that the European war had broken out. They were on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, and those in charge of the vessel being a little bit fearful that a British cruiser might attack them, the ship was turned about and steamed back to the United States. So that the delegation had the privilege at that time of taking a short ocean trip at Government expense and seeing one-half of the ocean twice without ever getting to the meeting of the Interparliamentary Union, which was at that time in a free-for-all fight.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will not the Senator from Colorado inform us what if anything these delegations to the meetings of the Interparliamentary Union have ever accomplished?

Mr. ADAMS. I think I can say, from my experience, that, so far as the purpose ascribed—the purpose to promote international arbitration—is concerned, nothing has been accomplished. Other things may have been accomplished. I think it is agreeable and profitable to bring American politicians into contact, in friendly days, with those of foreign nations. I think the American group is very weak in that it is made up of officials, and yet without any very definite official designation. We attend the meetings, not by appointment of the executive department charged with the conduct of our foreign relations, but by appointment of the chairman of the delegation, who was last year a Member of the House of Representatives, who proceeded to pick delegates as he saw fit. That is, the authority does not come from the Congress, or from the Senate, except as I understand in a general sense every Member of both Houses is theoretically a member. I ask the Senator from Kentucky whether that is not true.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. ADAMS. The selection of those who are to have the benefits of the trip and represent their associates is made, at least it was a year ago, by a very well-known Member of the House of Representatives.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Every Member of the House and Senate is eligible to participate in the meetings of the Interparliamentary Union. They do not all do it, however.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, it seems to me this appropriation should by all means be continued. I agree with the Senator from Colorado that Europe would not be a good place for the meeting of the Interparliamentary Union this year, but I think it would be well to hold the meeting in the United States. If the delegates should come to this country to have a conference, say in Washington, they could visit our world fairs at New York and San Francisco, and they could see what is done in this, a peaceful country, in contrast with conditions in their own countries, where the people are at war. I believe a meeting in the United States this year would be a very good thing, and well worth the $20,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I do not wish to prolong the discussion, but I cannot let go unanswered one or two suggestions which have been made in the debate.

First, I want it understood that I have no personal interest in this appropriation. I have no interest in knowing, or projecting, or suspecting, or suggesting, or prophesying whether, if it is continued, I will go to any conference, no matter where it may be held.

I have been active in the Interparliamentary Union for a number of years. The first conference I attended was at Stockholm, Sweden, in 1921, and I was chosen one of the delegates at that time from the House of Representatives by the then Senator from Illinois, Mr. McKinley, who was the president of the Interparliamentary Union.

Later an able Ohio statesman, one who distinguished himself in the House of Representatives and in the Senate for a number of years, Hon. Theodore Burton, became the president of the Interparliamentary Union, and I was included in the delegation which was selected by him.

Later a very distinguished statesman from Virginia, former Governor Montague, for nearly a quarter of a century a member of the House of Representatives, became the head of the American group, and I went as a delegate then. When he retired I was chosen by the members who had taken an interest in the activities of the Interparliamentary Union as the president of the American group. When I retired a year ago I did so with the expectation that I would not ever again head this organization, and I had no interest in doing so, and no desire to do so. But, as I stated a while ago in reply to a question of the Senator from Michigan, in my absence and against my own judgment the American group, largely attended by Members of the House of Representatives, not many Senators being present, selected me again as the head of the group.

I feel it my duty to defend the organization, and not merely as an obligation, but because of my experience with it. It is true that the delegates who go to the meetings are not authorized by the American Government to bind the United States in anything; and that is well. This is an organization that was founded for the purpose of bringing about arbitration and the settlement of disputes by peaceful methods rather than by the sword, and the mere fact that it has not always succeeded in so doing is no argument against the effort it has made.

I may say that the first and second Hague conferences called by the Czar of Russia were very largely due to the activities of the Interparliamentary Union. The conference which was called by Theodore Roosevelt, President of the United States, to settle the war between Russia and Japan, was called on the recommendation and at the request of the Interparliamentary Union; and as a result of that conference, held in the city of Portsmouth, N. H., the war between Russia and Japan was brought to a conclusion.

It is true, as we all know, and as the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] has so eloquently said—and he can say the most commonplace things eloquently; if he ever says commonplace things, which he rarely does, he always clothes them with the choicest diction—that all over the world the parliamentary system is under attack from more sources than ever before in the last century. The question now is whether we shall succumb to the attack; whether we are willing to say that we no longer believe in making an effort to maintain the parliamentary system, and that we are not willing to spend $20,000 a year in order that our influence may be brought to bear upon the nations of the world.

Of course, if there is a conference held this year it may probably not be held in Europe, and probably will not be, but there are yet peaceful nations and peaceful locations in the world where such a conference can be held and can do much good. It might be held, as the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] said a moment ago, in Washington. It might even be held in Ottawa. It might be held in some South American country. It might be held in a peaceful European country. There are still some democracies left in Europe. There are Belgium, Holland, Norway, Sweden, and I hope Finland.

At the last conference I attended, which was held 2 years ago, delegates were present from Italy, delegates from Spain, from practically every other country in Europe except Germany and Russia. The reason delegates were not in attendance from Germany and Europe was that parliament had been abolished in those two countries.

Are we now willing to say that because those in control in two or three countries in Europe have succeeded in abolishing legislatures, because in those countries the voice of the people is no longer heard, and because they have ruthlessly invaded democracies which were adjacent to them, that we are no longer interested in the preservation of the parliamentary system? The preservation of the parliamentary system is really more important than even a temporary peace that might be patched up between warring nations.

Parliaments represent democracy, and the parliamentary theory of government represents the democratic theory. It is true that at these conferences different languages are spoken, and interpreters have to be employed in order to interpret the speeches made by representatives of different nations, but everyone knows that that is true with respect to every international conference that has ever been held or ever will be held.

When the present war is over and Germany, Russia, Finland, England, France, Poland, Czechoslovakia, and all the others meet to settle the terms of peace, different languages will be spoken—German, French, Italian—if representatives of those nations should finally get together in such a conference. The Polish language will be spoken, and English will be spoken. There will have to be interpreters to interpret the speeches made by the representatives of the various delegations. That is no argument against this appropriation. It is certainly no valid argument against the holding of these conferences in which representatives of various countries, speaking different languages, meet together. Is it to be seriously contended that because all the delegates cannot understand all the languages which are spoken there, they ought not to meet?

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. The remarks of the Senator from Kentucky lead me to ask a question, Is it true that the organization under discussion is a bureau of the Department of State?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; it is not a bureau of the Department of State. The Interparliamentary Union, I will say, has been made up of delegates from 40 or 50 nations, and they maintain a bureau in Geneva, Switzerland. It has no connection with the League of Nations, but it is maintained there because Geneva is a convenient place in a neutral country. There are expenses necessary to maintain that bureau, year by year, permanently. The secretary of it has been the secretary for the last 15 or 20 years to my certain knowledge.

I will say to the Senator from Vermont that during the entire period of the World War the Interparliamentary Bureau was maintained. There was no conference of the Interparliamentary Union until the war was over, but during the entire 4 years of the existence of the World War, the bureau was maintained, and we made an appropriation of $10,000 a year to that bureau. Immediately after the war ended a conference was held in a European capital, and there has been one held every year since. The bureau is a permanent organization.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the Senator yield for a further question?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. Has this bureau been in continuous existence for 50 years?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. May I ask further if there are archives and records of the activities of the Union throughout its 50 years of existence?

Mr. BARKLEY. There are. Records have been kept of the discussions. A stenographic report is made of every speech, of every resolution, of every motion, just as in any other conference, economic or political, that may be held, at which delegates from different nations assemble. There has been a continuous record kept of the conferences.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I wish to ask in particular about the representation in that bureau of the United States of America. Has it archives and records showing its contribution to the common action in the bureau?

Mr. BARKLEY. It has. We have a permanent secretary of the American group, who happens to be Dr. A. D. Call, who is the secretary also of the American Peace Society, an old organization in this country. Because of his knowledge of world conditions and his connection with this and other associations, he has been for years the secretary of the American group, and he keeps records of all we do, all we recommend, and all activities, all correspondence, and all resolutions. He keeps in close touch with the general bureau which is maintained in Geneva, and arranges with them for the various activities of the American group when the conferences are in progress and before.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. I wish to know, if the amendment should be agreed to by the Senate, would all that activity and the preservation and protection of those records be abandoned?

Mr. BARKLEY. I think so. I will say to the Senator there would be no appropriation out of which the secretary of the American group could be employed, and there would be no appropriation out of which we could make our contribution to the preservation of these records as they exist in the general office at Geneva.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. Is it not true that these records would not be abandoned; that they would be put into the Library of Congress for safekeeping?

Mr. BARKLEY. I suppose they might be placed somewhere for safekeeping, but the continuity of the records would be broken into, of course, and there would be no one in the United States charged with any responsibility, or who could afford to keep up the activity, unless we were willing to make this modest appropriation to carry on the work.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. AUSTIN. Then, is it true that agreeing to the amendment is the most effective way of completely terminating this activity, in which our country has cooperated for 50 years?

Mr. BARKLEY. Undoubtedly.

Mr. President, I hope the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I am not a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations which handled this matter. However, I did vote in the committee in favor of the majority action that was taken.

I have never had any faith in the usefulness of the Interparliamentary Union. In spite of what has been said today, I personally do not think it has ever brought about any concrete results that were of any particular benefit.

In any event, in spite of what the Senator from Kentucky has said, and in spite of what the Senator from North Dakota has said, I do not think there is much probability that any meeting of the union will be held this year.

This action on the part of the committee represents in part what the committee has been trying to do, and that is to cut down the appropriations for the next fiscal year. It is interesting to know whether the Senate is in favor of such action on their part, and this is a very good opportunity to try out the question. I hope very much that the Senate will sustain the committee in what it has done.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HALE. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senate has given ample proof of its willingness to stand by the committee, and stand by its own convictions, and stand by the necessity for reducing expenditures; and I, myself, have indicated my own willingness to do so by voting to reduce appropriations as they have been reduced by the bills which have been reported by the Committee on Appropriations. But the Senate should be accorded the right now and then to have its own views—certainly about an insignificant item such as this. I wish to be able to continue to cooperate with the Committee on Appropriations in reducing appropriations, and I intend to do so, but certainly we are not obligated in every instance, without reference to the amount or the cause involved, to sustain the Appropriations Committee merely because it has made a certain recommendation.

Mr. HALE. I think in this particular instance no case has been made showing the usefulness of the appropriation.

Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] has referred to the fact that the House had the right to choose the head of the American group, but turned that privilege over to the Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HALE. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator is not quite correct. They made their own choice, but chose a Member of the Senate instead of a Member of the House.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I am wondering whether or not the reason for doing so was that the Senator, who is very popular in this body, and who is the majority leader of this body, could make a better case than any other Member of this body for putting the legislation through. I am wondering whether or not that is the reason why the Senator was chosen, aside from his sterling qualities.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Senator wishes a categorical answer the answer is distinctly "No." We have never had any trouble in getting this appropriation through the Senate. It is the House that has heretofore hesitated about it.

Mr. HALE. But, Mr. President, the House having passed it this time, I think it was desired to make assurance double sure.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say to the Senator that that element had no influence whatever. It was not even thought of, because no Member of the Senate or the House suspected that there would be any effort to eliminate the appropriation. The question of who should be the head of the American group did not enter into consideration at all. I do not wish to enter into that phase of the matter because, as I said, I did not want the position. I had served my time, and I felt that a Member of the House ought to have it, and so stated. I did not even attend the meeting at which I was chosen; but, having been chosen, I accept my responsibilities.

Mr. HALE. I do not mean to intimate that the Senator had anything to do with such plan; but I thought that some such idea may have occurred to the Members of the House concerned.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I have only a word to say. As my interrogatories imply, I favor this appropriation; and, if necessary, I should favor a larger one, especially at this time, when all the world is in turmoil, and when everybody is on his knees praying for an ultimate peace that will be not merely a cessation of hostilities.

If this great country, the United States of America, is now to say to the world, in the crisis in which the world is suffering, that it is so cheap and small that it will discontinue the only service that a parliamentary body of this country has been rendering toward universal peace, merely because it costs $20,000, I want to cast my vote against such action and raise my voice in protest.

Mr. President, I believe there is a future for the world, not far away, which will be upon a higher plane of international relationship than any we have had before. As I harken back and hear history, speaking with venerable accent, I observe that civilization has moved along on a certain level for a time, then taken a plunge downward, and then surged upward to a still higher level. That course has been repeated throughout all time. We are now living in one of the depressions. We have dipped down, and I hope we have reached the bottom of the depression. I expect that we shall rise above the level upon which we previously lived. I look for a time—perhaps not in my lifetime but in the history of the world—when peace will depend upon the nations of the world exercising self-discipline, as men do, and avoiding the causes of conflict.

Certainly I want my country to stand for such sacrifices and such expenditures as it can well afford toward the ideal, toward perfection. We may never attain perfection, but we shall never make any progress unless we aim at perfection. This is a small contribution toward that end. If we can promote friendly and understanding relations with other parliamentary countries, if we can give them moral support and aid, and if we can take from them like help for our own consideration, we shall have done something toward reaching that ideal of relations among the nations of the earth.

When learned Senators rise and say that one cannot point to any definite benefit which has come from the Interparliamentary Union, I am a little inclined to believe that the essential facts are being ignored. As I have traveled about the world in different countries I have observed that relationships between governments depend somewhat upon the friendship of the nationals of those governments, and that if cordial relations exist between peoples it is easier to obtain accord between governments.

I favor the Interparliamentary Union. I hope it will be continued. I certainly should regret its being cut off for the consideration of $20,000 in the name of economy. I am for economy, but I mean to be for real economy. I do not think it is economy to do something which will discontinue an effort of this character, which has been proceeding for 50 years. If the Congress means only to suspend the activities of the Union for a time, I should like to see it provided with sufficient funds to take care of the permanent records, which show our relation to the Union for 50 years.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, just a word before we vote. It is true that this is a very small matter; but anyone who has served on the committee, and even those who have not served, must know what a tremendous pressure there is whenever the doctrine of economy is set up by the Appropriations Committee of either House. We have appeals to us from the bureaus and from the departments, and from all those who are interested in one way or another in the bureaus or departments; and it is a gigantic task to undertake to cut down appropriations. Anyone who has not tried it ought to try it once to see what a tremendous task it is.

The President has recommended a reduction of some $850,000,000 this year. The House and the Senate have been trying to aid those reductions. The President recognized the possible need for additional taxes of $450,000,000 or $460,000,000. The House and the Senate are both striving to reduce expenditures in order to avoid the imposition of further taxes on the people.

While the item under consideration is a small matter, it goes to the very life of what our committee is trying to do. We are trying to economize. We have economized in this bill. We are trying to cut down the appropriations in this bill. We have tried to cut down the appropriations in each of the bills before us. When we come to an item in which the Senate is interested, if we say, "We are in favor of economy when it comes to cutting down the bureaus and departments, but we are not in favor of economy when it comes to cutting off a junketing trip for Senators," in what sort of attitude are we placed? In my opinion, we are placed in a very awkward, embarrassing, and difficult situation.

It is true that the item under consideration is a small matter; but it brings up the whole question of economy and what we are going to do about economy. Under those circumstances the committee has eliminated this item. Ordinarily it would not make any difference; but at this particular time, when we are striving in every way to cut down appropriations so as to avoid the imposition of additional taxes on the people, it seems to me we ought to stand by the committee.

I hope the Senate will stand by the Appropriations Committee in its honest, earnest, and vigorous endeavor to bring about greater economy, and to avoid taxation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator knows that the President did not eliminate this small appropriation from his Budget.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no. The President could not be expected to go through all the items and hunt out this item and that item and eliminate it from the Budget. No; the President did not do it. I will say to the Senator from Kentucky that innumerable items which the President had recommended have been eliminated or cut down. That is not the question. I have no doubt that the President would be opposed to this item at this particular time if we could have his views on the subject.

Nearly the whole world is at war, directly or indirectly, and we are talking about having a conference of a union over in Europe, right in the heart of the war zone. I doubt whether any Senator would want to go there under the circumstances. There is no reason in the world why we should not economize even in this small matter. It is not the amount of the economy which is involved, it is the principle which is involved. We can strike out this item and put back some other item, if that is what we want to do. Whenever any Senator is interested in an item, or any particular bureau or department is interested in an item, we should not say "Restore the item. Force it upon the House. Make the House take it whether it wants to or not. Make the Government pay whether it wants to or not. Let us not economize. If anything pertains to us as a legislative body, directly or indirectly, hold it in at all costs. It makes no difference about economy. It makes no difference about taxation. Hold it in! Hold it in!"

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. There is no element of forcing something on the House. The House included this appropriation in the bill. All I am asking the Senate to do is to stand by the House, not because we are trying to put something over on the House.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no!

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator intimated that we were trying to put something over on the House.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I intimated nothing of the kind.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator intimated that if we should vote to restore this appropriation we would serve notice on the country that we are going to restore all appropriations.

Mr. McKELLAR. We would serve notice to the country that when any individual Senator is interested in an appropriation, however small, if it be merely $10,000, we would leave it in the bill, and economy would be "gone with the wind." Taxation, yes—put it on—but if any Senator is interested in an appropriation, or if the Senate, as a body, is interested, put it in or keep it in. I do not think we ought to legislate in that way. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee on page 18, line 1, on which the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BARKLEY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 20, line 16, after the word "exceed," to strike out "$5,901" and insert "$10,000"; on page 21, line 2, after the word "be," to strike out "necessary" and insert "authorized by the Secretary of State"; and in line 13, after the words "in all," to strike out "$1,093,000" and insert "$1,073,000", so as to read:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "International Boundary Commission, United States and Mexico," at the top of page 26, to insert:

Fence construction on the international boundary: For construction of fence along the international boundary as authorized by the act of August 19, 1935 (49 Stat. 660), $25,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the acquisition of lands or easements for sites for boundary fences except for procurement of abstracts or certificates of title, payment of recording fees, and examination of titles.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Cooperation with the American Republics," on page 30, line 23, after the word "periodicals", to strike out "$155,550" and insert "$120,500"; and on page 31, line 3, after the word "respectively" and the colon, to strike out "Department of Agriculture, for the Office of Foreign Agricultural Relations, $35,000", so as to read:

Salaries and expenses: For all expenses necessary to enable the Secretary of State to carry out the purposes of the act entitled "An act to auhorize the President to render closer and more effective the relationship between the American Republics," approved August 9, 1939, and to supplement appropriations available for carrying out other provisions of law authorizing related activities, including personal services in the District of Columbia; not to exceed $45,000 for printing and binding; stenographic reporting, translating, and other services by contract, without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (41 U. S. C. 5); expenses of attendance at meetings or conventions of societies and associations concerned with the furtherance of the purposes hereof; hire, maintenance, and operation of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles; and purchase of books of reference and periodicals $120,500; and the Secretary of State is hereby authorized, subject to the approval of the President, to transfer to other departments, agencies, and independent establishments of the Government for expenditure in the United States and in the other American Republics not exceeding the following amounts, respectively: Civil Aeronautics Authority, $2,500; Department of Commerce, for the Coast and Geodetic Survey, $15,000; Federal Security Agency for the Public Health Service, including not to exceed two additional regular active commissioned officers, $25,000, and the Office of Education, $10,000; Department of the Interior, for the Office of the Secretary, $18,000, and the Bureau of Fisheries, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 32, line 3, after the word "Department", to insert "or Federal Works Agency", so as to read:

The President, in his discretion, may assign officers of the Army or Navy or officers or employees of the Treasury Department or Federal Works Agency for duty as inspectors of buildings owned or occupied by the United States in foreign countries, or as inspectors or supervisors of buildings under construction or repair by or for the United States in foreign countries, under the jurisdiction of the Department of State, or for duty as couriers of the Department of State, and when so assigned they may receive the same traveling expenses as are authorized for officers of the Foreign Service, payable from the applicable appropriations of the Department of State.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Title II—Department of Commerce—Office of the Secretary", on page 33, line 2, after the word "Department", to strike out "$384,500" and insert "$546,500", so as to read:

Salaries: Secretary of Commerce, Under Secretary of Commerce, Assistant Secretary, and other personal services in the District of Columbia, including the Chief Clerk and Superintendent, who shall be chief executive officer of the Department and who may be designated by the Secretary of Commerce to sign minor routine official papers and documents during the temporary absence of the Secretary, the Under Secretary, and the Assistant Secretary of the Department, $546,500.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I rise in opposition to the committee amendment on line 2, at the top of page 33, to increase the House figure by $162,000. It is my understanding that the able chairman of the subcommittee, my good friend the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], will offer an amendment to earmark this increase for the personal services of experts and specialists in the Department of Commerce. Consequently I wish to discuss the increase on that assumption.

This is an increase of $162,000 to pay the salaries of 20 or more so-called business experts and specialists in the Department of Commerce. This item was put in last year, the argument being made at that time that the Secretary of Commerce would take out of business and the professions men who had been very successful, and that these men could do what civil-service employees could not do; namely, stimulate employment and perfect schemes for improving our economic system.

If Senators will glance at the record of the hearings beginning on page 159, I think they will agree with me that these experts really have accomplished nothing. All of us on the subcommittee made repeated inquiries of Dr. Thorp, of the Department of Commerce, who defended this item, trying to find out what the results of their labors have been. If Senators will look on page 159, they will see that Dr. Thorp said:

I think it is hard to indicate just what specific results have been accomplished, because in the first place while we were given the money as of the 1st of last July, it took some time to assemble the staff.

On page 162, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. McCARRAN] will be seen to have asked this question:

What beneficial result has flown from what you have described to us?

* * * * * * *

Dr. THORP. I do not think there is a beneficial result that applies as of the present moment.

Look again on page 163. After Dr. Thorp had described some of the studies these men had made, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] said:

I wish you would send us sample copies of the reports which you issue. I should like to see them.

But the volume of hearings contains no sample of this work.

Altogether, there are only two things which these men have done. One is to initiate a certain amount of statistical work on inventory change. The other is to send up a man to represent the Department of Commerce before the meetings of the Temporary National Economic Committee. I think I am not far wrong when I say that the Temporary National Economic Committee—which, I am sure, is doing excellent work—has one of the largest appropriations any special committee has ever had, that it ought to be able to get along with the staff it has, and that if the Committee needs further assistance we can appropriate for that purpose. We do not need to appropriate $162,000 for a number of supposedly non-civil-service experts.

I desire to give one last illustration of the fruitless nature of the effort which has been made by these men.

On page 164 the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] says:

I think the most important thing you have is special promotion of Latin-American trade. There ought to be something concrete from that activity. What have you done?

Dr. THORP. We cannot point definitely to orders that have been obtained by the two men who have been working at it. We can count, however, on things like this: A conference was held with the steamship people and the travel agencies to develop certain of the difficulties in the way of American tourist travel to Latin America. Those questions have been taken up with the representatives of the foreign countries. They are mostly matters of red tape.

Senator LODGE. Why are not matters of red tape a pure State Department function? What is the State Department for if it is not for that?

Dr. THORP. I suppose it could be handled through the State Department, except that it is not a matter which necessarily needs to go through all the formalities of diplomatic processes.

Senator LODGE. The State Department handles many things that do not go through the formality of diplomatic processes.

Dr. THORP. Our interest in it was to cut through and see if we could get something done quickly.

Senator LODGE. You do not mean to say that the State Department does not want to cut through and get things done?

Dr. THORP. No. I certainly do not want to leave that impression.

I give that example to show that this thing is a fifth wheel. It is simply a duplication of all sorts of functions that are being performed either by the State Department or by the standing bureaus of the Department of Commerce with the very able staff which I think they already have there. The only justification, if there is one, for this appropriation—which was so wisely stricken out in the House—is that there is some possibility in the future that these men will accomplish something; in other words, that they have some prospect of doing so. In order to decide that question, in order to decide whether there is any possibility that they ever will accomplish something, I think we ought to look at the fundamental nature of the problem.

During the meeting of our Committee, both the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from South Carolina and myself dwelt on the tremendous importance of getting some of this trade in Latin America, particularly getting the development in manufactured goods which hitherto had been the province of German trade. We all agreed that the problem of South America is a problem of having them produce something that we want and do not produce; but as long as they compete with us in the production of cattle and in the production of cotton and in the production of other agricultural products which we also produce, we cannot possibly hope to make a real, substantial expansion of our export trade in manufactured goods. In other words, the desirable thing would be to see a production of rubber in South America, a production of tin in South America, an increased production of coffee in South America, of those things which we need and do not ourselves produce. That would increase our trade; but, Mr. President, just a glance at that proposition shows how absolutely absurd it is to think that by getting a group of high-pressure business executives down here for a few days we can really make a dent in that problem. It involves fundamental factors which are entirely beyond the reach of any governmental bureau.

I think these men are superfluous. It is another case of the secretary to the secretary to the assistant secretary who is on civil service to the expert who is not on civil service. We have so many wheels within wheels going on downtown that it is practically impossible to understand what they are all doing; and if Senators read this record even more carefully than I have given it to them, they will see that these men must be constantly getting in each other's way.

Of course, a good deal was made of the fact that these men had turned down big salaries in business in order to come here and work for Uncle Sam; that they were really "dollar-a-year men." I shall not go into that subject. I find that there are only 3 dollar-a-year men out of the 22 or 23 who are on the list. The idea was that they would just come in for 6 months, because we could not get really able businessmen to come down here for a longer time than that. Well, it will be seen in the hearings that with one exception none of them have agreed to leave at any time. I think you, Mr. President, who have been Governor of a State [Mr. CHANDLER in the chair], and others here on the Senate floor who have had experience in government, know that there are very, very few men who willingly leave a governmental office. It may be that this is a very, very patriotic, self-sacrificing activity on their behalf. It may be that they are losing $25,000 a year in some corporation in order to come here and work for $9,000. Perhaps that is so; but I doubt if there are on this list the names of very many men who are exceedingly anxious to get out of Washington. I think they like it here; I think they hope to stay here; and I say to you in conclusion that if we are going to have economy, this is one place where we can do it. We can do it without impairing the public service. We can do it without depriving the American people of any results or benefits that they are now getting. We can do it without the slightest hardship to any of the men who are on this list, because they are all, in the language of the street, what might be called big shots. They can all go back to their homes, and they will not starve.

I very much hope the committee amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I dislike to oppose the suggestion of my distinguished friend the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I have served on the Committee on Appropriations for a number of years—about a fifth of a century—and I look upon the Senator from Massachusetts as one of the most excellent members of that committee, without regard to politics of any kind.

With respect to the item now under discussion, it is an increase of $162,000. I remind the Senate that last year the Secretary of Commerce came before the committee and secured an appropriation of about the same sum for the purpose primarily of increasing our Latin-American trade. He wanted business experts; and I have no doubt, considering the evidence, that for the most part he has secured business experts for the important places.

When he came before our committee he did not know that the war now in progress would be started and would give us the remarkable opportunity we now have to get a large part of the South American trade. We have a splendid opportunity to secure some of that trade. As everyone knows, Great Britain, Germany, Japan, and Italy are our principal competitors for what is known as South American trade. It is well known that Germany is out of the picture at this time because of being engaged in war, as is Great Britain to a lesser degree. Japan, also being engaged in war, is not so much in the picture as she previously was. Italy, for fear she might get into war, is not as active in South America, perhaps, as formerly.

There never was such an opportunity for our country to build up its trade with South America as we now have. Concrete instances were given of improvement in our trade, in one case there being an increase of $162,000 in one industry. In my judgment, the opportunity is ours, and I urged the officers of the Department of Commerce to bend their efforts solely to the retention of this trade in South America while we have the opportunity to hold it.

I doubt whether I would vote for such an item another year if all nations should be at peace. It may be that it should be discontinued next year; I think I would vote for its discontinuance after we had accomplished what we desired—that is, to increase our trade with South America. I happened to be in South America a year or two ago, and I know something about the possibilities. I believe it would be enormously beneficial for our Government to undertake to secure as much of the trade of South America as it is possible to secure. We have tried to be economical, and I doubt whether a bill ever reported to this body has shown greater economy than is exhibited in the particular bill now pending.

We are not asking the Senate to act on something that has been going on for 50 years, something from which we have never been able to see any results, but this appropriation is proposed in an effort to improve what has been going on for about 8 months only. Let us give it a show in the interest of our country, and in the interest of the trade of our country.

It was for these reasons that the committee put this item in the bill, and I think it should be kept in the bill and I ask my colleagues to let it remain in the bill. I hope the amendment of the committee will be agreed to.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. I think the Senator has on his desk a provision of limitation.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have.

Mr. McNARY. What effect would that have upon the bare amendment offered by the able Senator from Massachusetts? What would it do?

Mr. McKELLAR. As I understand, the Senator from Massachusetts desires to restore the House figures by striking out the Senate committee figures.

Mr. McNARY. If that should be accomplished, what would be the effect of the Senator's proposed limitation?

Mr. McKELLAR. There would be nothing in the limitation, if that were accomplished, because it would not be necessary. The limitation went out on a point of order in the House. I believe the House would have kept this item in the bill and this amount of money in the bill, but in the House the item went out on a point of order. I wish to read the proviso at this point. It comes immediately after the "$546,500."

Provided, That not to exceed $100,000 of this appropriation shall be available for expenditure by the Secretary of Commerce for personal services of experts and specialists at rates of compensation not in excess of $9,000 per annum without regard to the civil-service laws and regulations or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended.

Then I proceed to the next proviso, which is a part of this item, and which the committee has authorized me to offer as a committee amendment on the floor. I will speak of the first proviso for just a moment.

The reason for the proviso that appointments may be made without regard to the civil-service laws and regulations or the Classification Act is that it was desired by the Secretary of Commerce to get practical businessmen, so far as possible, to carry out the purpose he has in view, so that the United States might secure a greater portion of the South American trade. Now I read the second proviso:

Provided further, That no part of the said $100,000 shall be used for the payment of any person hereafter appointed at a salary of $5,000 per annum or more unless such person is appointed by the President, by and with the advice of the Senate.

If the Senate committee amendment shall be agreed to, I shall offer that amendment on behalf of the committee.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. GILLETTE. As I understood the Senator, the amendment he proposes to offer—and I tried to follow it in the text—is identical with the limitation amendment proposed in the House of Representatives. Is that true?

Mr. McKELLAR. The first part of the amendment is identical with that which went out on a point of order in the other House. The second part of the amendment, which provides that "no part of the said $100,000 shall be used for the payment of any person hereafter appointed at a salary of $5,000 per annum or more unless such person is appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," is an addition by the Senate committee.

Mr. GILLETTE. If this amendment should be agreed to, what limitation would there be, or what suggestion would there be in the law to limit the employment of these experts and specialists to those who, it is contemplated, will build up our South American or Central American trade? I call attention to the language, which authorizes the use of the amount of money specified "for personal services of experts and specialists" at not to exceed $9,000 a year. What would they be: trade specialists, political specialists, party specialists? What is the purpose, or what is the limitation?

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be glad to read from the testimony, which I think will answer the Senator.

Mr. GILLETTE. It may clear it up, but I am asking about the language in the bill. What limitation is there in the proposal?

Mr. McKELLAR. The limitation in the bill is, of course, that only $100,000 of the $546,000 shall be used for the employment of this kind of help. In the next place, it cannot be used to pay compensation in excess of $5,000 per annum without the advice and consent of the Senate.

The purpose is shown in a question I asked in the hearings:

I suggested to Mr. Johnson and to these other gentlemen a while ago that we should like to have them cut down the $546,500 to an even half million dollars. They want the language referred to put back. I think, by all means, whether they wish it or not, it ought to be put back. They ought to get the best men they can, regardless of any civil-service law.

These are supposed to be experts; they ought to be men learned in business and in trade and commerce.

I suggested to Mr. Johnson cutting down the $546,500 to an even half million dollars and trying to get along on the smaller amount. We must cut down on expenditures to some extent, and a reduction of $46,500 would be very acceptable to this committee and would lead us to be very enthusiastic if you can get along with it.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. First let me finish the quotation—

At this time of crisis in our business with South America, why can you not turn in and help the gentlemen whom you have employed, take the lead if necessary, and let us get something concrete? Let us get something beneficial to our country, just as we did in the contract we got with the aircraft concern for carrying our mail across the waters.

That referred to Mr. Johnson. That shows the purpose.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. GILLETTE. For what is the $162,000 to be used? There is a provision for an increase of $162,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is for clerical assistance, stenographers, and bookkeepers, and others connected with the undertaking.

Mr. McNARY obtained the floor.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President——

Mr. McNARY. I shall be happy to defer to the able Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES. If the Senator wishes to proceed, very well. I merely desire to speak for a few minutes.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, quite frankly I am going to discuss a point of order which I shall make. If the Senator wishes to discuss the matter on the merits I shall yield to him.

Mr. BYRNES. As I understand, the pending question is the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have offered no amendment. I am simply opposing the committee amendment in line 2.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. BYRNES. On that amendment, Mr. President, I wish to make a statement. When this matter was before the committee last year I was greatly interested in it, because I believed that the businessmen of the country would be interested in having in the Department of Commerce some few men with long business experience, men successful in their own businesses, with whom the Department might discuss a number of matters which then were deemed of importance by the Secretary of Commerce. I must say that I thought it offered greater hope and greater encouragement than many other expenditures made by the Department. I believed that the man who is successful in his own business is unwilling to go through the trouble of the civil-service examination in order to serve under the Department; that the salary was not particularly attractive; and I was quite sympathetic with the desire of the Secretary of Commerce to induce a group of successful businessmen to come into the Department for a limited time to give their advice upon a number of very important matters. If he could not get them in that way, he did not wish to try to bring them in. He knew it would then be difficult to bring them in. Yet some of the great corporations of the country at times have shown a disposition to encourage some of their employees to accept assignments with the Government, and at other times businessmen desiring to render a service to the Government have shown a disposition to undertake such service. I was willing to let the Secretary of Commerce make a trial of such a program.

At the committee meeting last week the Department reported on what had been done. The Secretary had been successful in inducing a number of men of considerable experience in business to come into the Department to help in the effort he was making to bring the Department closer to business.

I realize it is difficult for an executive to evaluate in dollars and cents the services rendered by a group of businessmen of that character, and yet some things were said that interested me. I was impressed by the fact that a successful business executive who came into the Department had caused a new series of voluntary reports to be made by businessmen, and the necessary service is being furnished to those business houses that cooperate and subscribe for it. Under this man's direction more than 900 business houses are furnishing information weekly as to inventory.

The representative of the Department who appeared before the committee called attention to the fact that if in 1937 we had had such information as to how far production was ahead of consumption, the Government might have been able to step in and take effective action, but it did not do so because it did not then have the necessary information. Even last fall, when the situation arose which inspired the program which is now being developed most satisfactorily, we did not know whether consumption was of a speculative character growing out of the war, or whether it was of a solid, stable character.

From the weekly reports of inventories now obtained from the various industries it is possible to get a more accurate idea of the situation, which is of great importance to the business interests of the country.

Reference has been made to the Temporary National Economic Committee. The only statement concerning that committee was that one gentleman who had come into the Department had been sent from the Department to sit in with the committee simply as an observer, and no further mention was made of the matter, but the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] who attended a meeting of the Appropriations Committee thereafter, paid tribute to the very excellent advice that was offered by this busy man respecting questions which arose before the committee.

In addition to what I thought last year with respect to the opportunity for service, I must say that after September 1, when the war began, I came to the conclusion that if there ever was a time for us to do anything in the countries to the south now is the time. I do not know what the Department of Commerce has done heretofore. Through the years, while serving on the Appropriations Committee, I have tried at various times through different administrations to get some accurate information, and have regretted that I did not see more practical results. But I know what ought to be done. In my opinion, now, when orders are cut off from Germany and from Great Britain, when they cannot be placed there with any hope of being filled, the United States should make every possible effort to extend its commercial relations with the nations to the south. I think a statement of mine brought about a discussion of what a few men, paid out of this appropriation, can do. One illustration was cited. An order for machinery was placed in Germany by a South American country about the time the war started. The president of an American machine company immediately came down to consult one of these businessmen assigned to the Department, whom he knew and with whom he was in contact, concerning that matter. I can readily understand how the businessman would come more readily to an individual whom he had known than to other employees of the Department. As a result of the visit, the order for that machinery was secured for this country. It gave employment to our people. Whether these business representatives in the Department should do more, I do not know. I think they should. I hope they will.

The members of the Appropriations Committee were of the opinion that inasmuch as these men were in the Department, we should direct their attention to what we considered was important at this time. We found that they shared that view, and they were interested in doing everything possible.

The United States is a great market for rubber. We buy more than 50 percent of the rubber produced. No rubber is produced in the United States. If, through the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, we can induce Brazil to go into the production of rubber instead of cotton, to produce something for which we provide a market instead of something which is in competition with our producers—and other products were mentioned by these gentlemen in discussing the matter before the committee—if we could do that now, then after peace is restored, business relations will have been established which will be of inestimable value to the United States. The Department would fail to take advantage of the present opportunity if it did not proceed with all possible activity to develop the South American market.

At this time four men are serving for a dollar a year. One man was offered a salary of $20,000 or $25,000 elsewhere, but instead he came down here to accept $7,200 to serve the Government. The Senator from Massachusetts says there is no contract. That is true, but the Department is trying to induce these men to stay as long as they can in order to obtain the benefit of their advice. I think it is wise to do what we can so they may continue their efforts along this line.

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. GILLETTE] asked a question on that point. There is in the language nothing that would indicate that their efforts should be directed solely to that end. The statement gives the number of men employed, who they are, what they are paid, and what they have been doing. I can tell the Senator that they are not doctors of politics. And I think the statement was made the Department had no idea as to the politics of a single one of these men. I think I facetiously expressed regret that it did not have. But, as a matter of fact, they are engaged in work which is political, and notwithstanding the fear expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts, they are men who are anxious to get back to their businesses, and are not anxious to stay on the rolls at the salaries they are receiving.

Mr. McKELLAR. Since the hearings were held Mr. Kerlin, of the Department, has given us some concrete figures as to the changes in trade with South America on the part of the United Kingdom, Germany, and the United States. I should like to call the Senator's attention to them at this point.

Imports from Argentina, Costa Rica, and Haiti to Great Britain have decreased in the past 4 months from $25,865,000 to $19,362,000. Exports have decreased from $50,118,000 to $45,065,000.

With respect to Germany, imports from the same countries have decreased from $15,062,000 to $5,719,000; and exports have decreased from $12,993,000 to $2,117,000.

The total United Kingdom trade with the three countries named for the same 4 months has decreased from $75,983,000 to $64,427,000; and in the case of Germany the total trade has decreased from $28,055,000 to $7,836,000.

These are the figures for the 4 war months.

The imports of the United States from Latin America have increased from $151,424,000 to $200,233,000, while exports have increased from $186,819,000 to $265,643,000. General trade has increased in the same 4 months, as compared with 1938, from $338,243,000 to $465,876,000. Trade with Brazil, Chile, Peru, and Colombia has increased to an even greater extent.

If the Senator is willing, I ask that the statement to which I have referred may be printed in the RECORD at this point, to show the enormous increase in the business of the United States during the war period. It seems to me that as good businessmen we ought to aid in making the increases even larger.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am much interested in what has just been said. Certainly the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] is one of the most brilliant of men. When he is defending a meritorious cause he is irresistible, and he is almost as irresistible when he is defending a cause without much merit. In this particular case he has made the best of a bad job.

I still think that the burden of proof rests on those who want to have this appropriation made. We hear the statement that businessmen in the country do not want to come to Washington and talk to a civil service bureau chief; that they are too shy, or too particular, or they feel too flustered in Washington when they talk to a civil-service bureau chief. I think that is an absurd argument. If businessmen are such sensitive flowers that they cannot talk to the Chief of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, or if the Chief of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce is so incompetent that businessmen cannot get any results from a conference with him, then the whole system is hopeless, and we should do something drastic about it, and not merely tinker with it.

So far as the railroad order in the Argentine is concerned, I should like to quote what was said on that subject by Mr. Young in the hearings. Mr. Young is a regular Department of Commerce official. He is the Director of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. He is not one of the high-pressure, non-civil-service experts. I asked him how the deal for railroad equipment in the Argentine was put over, and this is what he said, on page 168:

In the case of this railway equipment, the vice president of the American company came to see us—

The "us" does not refer to the newly appointed, non-civil-service business experts. The "us" refers to the regular civil-service employees of the Bureau—and called our attention to the fact that with the change in conditions he thought they might have a chance to bid for this order, and asked for our assistance. We immediately got in touch with the commercial attaché—

The commercial attaché is a regular official of the Department of Commerce. He is not somebody who was brought in during the past 6 months in order to try to work up some new business—and got him to go to work on it, furnishing him from here all the information necessary; and he, in cooperation with the representative of the company, eventually succeeded in getting the order.

That is the famous Argentine railway matter. I think the evidence is conclusive that the result was due entirely to the regular staff of the Department of Commerce, working with the representatives of the American company.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the able Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is asking the Senate to reject the committee amendment. In that request I concur. However, in order to consider the whole matter intelligently, I think we should keep in mind and revert to the proposal about to be offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

The bill as it now reads carries $546,500, for what? After enumerating the officials in the Department of Commerce, the language is:

To sign minor routine official papers and documents during the temporary absence of the Secretary.

It occurs to me that that language has nothing to do with encouraging American business in South America and Central America. Its purpose can be conceived only when we consider the proposal which is about to be offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McNARY. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. The information which we have given to the Senate is the positive statement of the representative of the Department to the committee as to the purpose for which the money would be spent.

Mr. McNARY. I appreciate that; and I am not questioning the fairness of the statement. I am not complaining about the attitude of the Senator. I am speaking about the limitations of the bill, and the proper construction to be given to the language of the bill. The language making the increase in appropriation of $162,000 states specifically that it is for an executive officer—

To sign minor routine official papers and documents during the temporary absence of the Secretary.

However, beyond the hearing, we have the committee amendment in the possession of the able Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], which amplifies the reasons for the expenditure of that money, and says specifically, with limitations, for what it is to be used. I am now addressing myself to the larger question.

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator will agree that in the second line of that section is the language, "and other personal services." The employment of persons is authorized under the organic act.

Mr. McNARY. The question has nothing whatsoever to do with the purposes stated by the able Senator from South Carolina. I am not quarreling with him.

Mr. President, in my opinion we should consider these proposals together. While the proposal of the Senator from Tennessee is not now before the Senate, I realize that if the amount of money recommended by the Senate committee is appropriated, no use will be made of that money unless it is tied in with the amendment to be offered by the Senator from Tennessee on behalf of the committee. Only then does it make sense. The proposal to be offered by the Senator from Tennessee is the only excuse for increasing the amount. It reads:

On page 33, line 2, following the figure "$546,500," insert the following: "Provided, That not to exceed $100,000 of this appropriation shall be available for expenditure by the Secretary of Commerce for personal services of experts and specialists at rates of compensation not in excess of $9,000 per annum without regard to the civil-service laws and regulations or the Classification Act of 1923, as amended: Provided further, That no part of the said $100,000 shall be used for the payment of any person hereafter appointed at a salary of $5,000 per annum or more unless such person is appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Mr. President, in my opinion, that language comes within the prohibitive rule. It is language which may not be inserted in an appropriation bill, because it is legislative language in character. Being legislative language in character—and I shall make the point of order—it is useless to consider the increase for salaries if the very purposes of the increase are denied by the Senate, and the Chair in his wisdom removes the question from the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, from the information I have, and from the knowledge I have of the rules of the Senate, I think it is unquestionably true that that particular part of the proviso is subject to a point of order. We thought so in the committee, and for that reason it was to be offered as a separate amendment. Of course, that means that the bill must lie over another day when the point of order is made, because when we reach the question under the regular routine of the Senate I shall give notice of a motion to suspend the rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair gives notice that if and when the point of order is made he will rule upon it; but until it is made the Chair is not in a position to rule.

Mr. McKELLAR. The question is not now before the Senate.

Mr. McNARY. The amendment has not yet been offered. However, it will be. I shall then make the point of order. However, in order to discuss fully and completely the value of the amendment offered by the able Senator, it is necessary to consider the whole transaction.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator is entirely correct. As a matter of fact, the committee determined that part of the amendment was subject to a point or order, and directed the chairman of the subcommittee to offer it as a separate amendment. During the day I shall conform to the rule and make a motion to suspend the rule. Of course, whether or not the rule shall be suspended will depend upon how the Senate votes.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I do not know who guides the committee in its deliberations. However, the mere fact of authorizing one Senator to present a committee amendment does not in any way affect the rule. The amendment might as well have been written into the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. The difference is that under the rules of the Senate, if it had been written into the bill it would have had to go back to the committee; so we left it out of the bill. As a matter of fact, the committee did not think it would be objected to; but it has been objected to, or rather the Senator has given notice that it will be objected to. Therefore I shall make the motion to suspend the rule; and, of course, the matter will have to go over when it is reached.

Mr. McNARY. I disagree also with that statement. It is, in my opinion, an erroneous view, that the mere raising of a point of order sends the whole bill back to the committee. It does not do so. That question has been ruled on several times within the last few years. However, I do not care anything about that, but I shall make the point of order when the proper time comes. I may add that I cannot see the reason why the Senator wants to persist in urging this amendment providing an increase of $162,000 unless he accompanies it with language explaining it.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is the purpose, of course, to have the accompanying language in both provisos. I think it very wise to do that; but, of course, if the Senator makes the point of order when it comes up, we will have to conform to the rule.

Mr. McNARY. Let me suggest that the question of the increase be passed over for the present, and if the Senator offers his proposal, I shall make a point of order and see what the future has in store for the bill.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I think we should proceed in order. The question is on the amendment as to the amount. If the Senator sees fit to make a point of order, we will cross that bridge when we come to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, as to whether or not it is advisable to hire experts to develop South American trade is a controversial matter which may well be debated, with logical argument presented on both sides, but there can be no controversy, in my opinion, as to the obligation of the Congress of the United States to legislate intelligently. There is no excuse under the sun for the Senate of the United States or the Congress of the United States to continue legislating in a nebulous, hazy, and uncertain way, and leave to administrative officials the duty of interpreting what we are not able to interpret here on the floor. If it is wise and necessary to authorize the employment of experts to develop South American or Latin American trade, why not present the matter on that basis and state the number to be appointed, how much they shall be paid, and what duties they shall perform?

I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the situation in which we find this proposal at the present time.

I read from the bill that is on our desks:

Salaries: Secretary of Commerce, Under Secretary of Commerce, Assistant Secretary, and other personal services in the District of Columbia, including the Chief Clerk and Superintendent * * * $546,500.

That lump-sum appropriation is made available by this proposal, without the amendment to be offered by the Senator from Tennessee, for the purpose of paying the salaries of the Secretary, the Under Secretary, the Assistant Secretary, the Chief Clerk, the Superintendent, and other personal services in the District of Columbia.

Incidentally, the sum of $546,500 is 70 percent more than the high point when Mr. Hoover was Secretary; it is 60 percent more than the high point when Mr. Roper was Secretary. If the provision is left in its present shape, the amount of money proposed to be appropriated will be for the purpose of paying the specific salaries indicated.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I think the Senator is aware that under our procedure when the President submits a request for a certain amount for the Secretary, the Under Secretary, the Assistant Secretary, and personal services, the Budget submits to the Congress a statement setting forth in detail the salaries of those for whom the amount is appropriated, and the Appropriations Committee of the Senate holds the departments affected by this bill close to the statement of the Budget as to the purpose for which the money is to be spent. So there is information as to the amount of the salaries.

Mr. GILLETTE. There is no question in the world that there is information or suggestion, but there is no obligation on the part of the Congress to follow that recommendation.

Mr. BYRNES. There is the obligation that the department shall follow it. If the department should vary from it, as the Department of Justice did in using some of the funds appropriated in a general administrative lump sum for the employment of a personnel official when the estimate was not submitted to the Budget, and the amount specifically requested by the Budget, Congress may take appropriate action. Indeed, in this bill the appropriation requested for the official in question has been disallowed and he will have to be discharged.

Mr. GILLETTE. That is a matter of control later by making the money available or not making it available.

Mr. BYRNES. If, during the year, a department employs a man, under a lump sum, when his services were not set forth in the appropriation bill we would not know it until the department again comes before the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. GILLETTE. If the contention of the able Senator from South Carolina is correct—and I am sure he feels it is, and far be it from me to dispute with him on any ordinary matter—that the control of this sum of $546,500 is in the estimates submitted by the Bureau of the Budget, there is no occasion whatever for the limitation offered by the Senator from Tennessee, because it is limited by the Budget recommendation and by that alone.

Mr. BYRNES. There is only one reason for the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee. Under the language of the bill as it now stands, taken in connection with the Budget and everything else, those who are appointed must be appointed from the civil-service eligible list. The purpose of the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee is to permit the appointment of a certain number, not more than then could be included within $100,000, outside the eligible list.

Mr. GILLETTE. The amendment goes much further than that. The amendment attempts to limit the appropriation in the sum of $100,000 to certain experts and specialists.

Mr. BYRNES. I can say to the Senator that if he will read it closely there can be no question that the purpose is that $100,000 of this amount shall be spent for experts and specialists appointed without regard to the classification law. If it were not for that, it would be in order; but that makes it subject to a point of order. That is the only reason for the amendment.

Mr. GILLETTE. I am not debating the point of order; but let me say that, while there may be no doubt or question in the mind of the distinguished Senator from South Carolina or in the mind of the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, there is doubt in the mind of members of the committee, because this afternoon on the floor I asked a member of the committee what the extra $62,000 was for, and he said it was to be used for traveling expenses.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no. It is for clerks and clerical assistance.

Mr. GILLETTE. I am not referring to the able Senator from Tennessee. I said another member of the committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well.

Mr. GILLETTE. I asked a question of the able Senator from Tennessee, and he said the $62,000 was to be used for stenographers and certain clerical assistants, but I am referring to the fact that the Senator from South Carolina said there could be no doubt, when there is a doubt in the minds of members of the committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. GILLETTE. Just a moment. He said that the amount is to be used for traveling expenses, when there is a provision in the bill that all traveling expenses in all the bureaus and divisions must be paid out of the $238,000 appropriation for that specific item.

Mr. BYRNES. My statement was not that there could be no doubt was a positive way of making the statement. I will withdraw it, because there may always be doubt in the minds of some individuals—and it is not a criticism of any individual to say so—but there is no justification for the doubt, I should have said.

Mr. GILLETTE. I will say, from my limited experience in the Senate, I am always convinced when the Senator from South Carolina makes a statement, that there is no doubt in his mind as to the conclusion he has reached. Unfortunately, sometimes I cannot reach the same conclusion, but I always credit him with logically reaching his.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GILLETTE. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator propose to move to amend this amendment? What is the Senator's proposal?

Mr. GILLETTE. I have not yet proposed an amendment. I am trying to present the picture as it appears to me. With this bill in the form in which it is presented, with no limitation on the $162,000 increase except the hoped-for limitation suggested by the Senator from South Carolina, if the amendment is adopted as proposed by the Senator from Tennessee, it will limit the $100,000 but not the $62,000, which is left exactly as this provision of the bill now provides. The $100,000 will be limited to the employment of experts and specialists, with a maximum salary of $9,000 a year, and the elimination of the requirement as to civil service, and the added provision that if they are paid over $5,000 a year they will have to be confirmed by the Senate. There is, however, no limitation as to what type of experts or specialists shall be appointed and no limitation whatever as to what they may be used for. There is no suggestion that they are to be used to develop trade with the Latin American countries, but they are to be merely experts or specialists, to be hired in any number, to be hired under any salary, with a $9,000 limitation, limited only by the $100,000 appropriation, and there is no limitation at all of the $62,000 to the use that is designated in line 17, namely, to the salaries of the Secretary of Commerce, the Under Secretary, the chief clerk, the superintendent, and other services.

That is the point I am making.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, if he will look on page 161 of the hearings he will find the list of those who are now employed; and, as I understand, most of them, at any rate, will continue to be employed unless they resign or vacancies occur, which will be filled.

There is one at $9,000, one at $7,500, one at $7,250, another one at $7,000, one at $6,600, one at $6,000, two at $5,600, three at $5,000, two at $4,600, four at $4,000, one at $4,200, one at $3,800, one at $3,500, one at $3,200, and one at $2,600.

Those are the men who are now in this division. They were employed as experts or specialists in trade; and it is for the purpose of keeping them at work that this appropriation is made.

Mr. GILLETTE. Mr. President, whenever a question is raised here on the floor, the Senators in charge of the bill call attention to the hearings. The hearings are valuable to develop for a committee or a subcommittee the facts in a case on which they may base the legislation they bring in here as our agents. I should like to have them call attention to something that is in the bill. Is there anything in the bill to require hiring the list of men the Senator from Tennessee has just read, or at the salaries named, or to limit their employment to that number, or to curtail that number?

We are legislating on the bills which are presented here. We develop in the hearings the facts for our guidance, which are helpful or not helpful, depending on what is developed; but the Senate is here to act on the report made by our agents. Our agents brought in here a proposal to spend $546,500 for the salaries, among others, of a half-dozen men without a limitation, an increase of $162,000. It is proposed by this amendment to limit $100,000 of the amount, but not to limit the remaining $62,000; and there is no limitation as to the number that may be employed, or for what purpose they may be employed.

The only point I have been trying to make, in my weak way, is that the time has long since passed when we should enact legislation and leave it to the tender mercies of some administration official, no matter who he may be. I am not questioning their honor or integrity or earnestness, but why can we not legislate intelligently, so that the administrative officials may properly interpret our legislation, and have a reasonable idea of what we are trying to place on the statute books?

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, I am very happy that those in charge of the bill have decided to call this an appropriation for experts and specialists, because if they had listed this amount for secretaries there would not be enough titles to go around for the different types of secretaries.

I made a survey of the official titles of the secretaries in the office of the Secretary of Commerce. It is very interesting, and I thought the Senate ought to have the benefit, and since we are going to call these people "experts and specialists," there would be less danger of confusing their titles. But here are the official titles, as listed in the Budget, of the secretaries in the office of the Secretary of Commerce:

The Secretary.
The Under Secretary.
Three Assistant Secretaries.
The administrative assistant.
Seven assistants to the Secretary.
Secretary to the administrative assistant.
Secretary to the Secretary.
Confidential assistant to the Secretary.
Secretary to the Under Secretary.
Secretary to the Assistant Secretary.
Secretary to the assistant to the Secretary. You have to watch yourself on that, or you will get confused in the tongue twister.
Confidential assistant to the Assistant Secretary.
Four special assistants to the Secretary.
[Laughter.]

All those are in the office of the Secretary; not in any bureau or division of that Department except in the office of the Secretary of Commerce.

I am sure these individuals are not underpaid, because here are their salaries:

The Secretary of Commerce gets $15,000, even if he is not there.
The Under Secretary gets $10,000, and we recently created his office. That was a noble act.
An Assistant Secretary, at $9,000.
Two special assistants to the Secretary, at $9,000 each.
An administrative assistant, at $9,000.
An assistant to the Secretary, at $9,000.
Two special assistant secretaries, at $7,500 each.
Two assistants to the Secretary, at $7,000 each. They were not quite as good as the other assistants.
Two assistants to the Secretary, at $6,000 each.
An assistant to the administrative assistant, at $5,800.
Two assistants to the Secretary, at $4,900 each.
A secretary to the Secretary, at $3,800.
A confidential assistant to the Secretary, at $3,200.
A secretary to the Assistant Secretary, at $3,100.
A secretary to the assistant to the Secretary, $3,100.
A secretary to the administrative assistant, at $3,100.
A secretary to the Under Secretary, at $2,600.
A confidential assistant to the Assistant Secretary, at $2,600.

Mr. President, you can imagine what a problem I faced the other day when I was told to call a secretary in the office of the Secretary of Commerce. With all those secretaries, whom should I call? Of course, it would be necessary to call an expert to find that out. I thought I would get an expert. I found four men not listed as secretaries but listed as experts, at $3,200, $3,800, and $4,000. Of course, these experts are little experts. They have bigger experts in addition to the little experts with a few middle-sized experts, and now we are going to add some more of them—some individuals who are supposed to know about South America. I found nine individuals as big experts, and here are their salaries: Three, at $5,000; two, at $5,600; one, at $6,000; one, at $6,600; two, at $7,000.

If the experts cannot solve the problem you may call up the Director of Personnel; if he is not in then you may call the assistant to the Director of Personnel, and if he is not in and if you are desperate you may call the secretary to the Director of Personnel, and find out what you wish to know.

Shades of bureaucracy! Think of that—a secretary to the secretary to the Assistant Secretary of the Secretary of Commerce! [Laughter.] And now they say we need some more experts. We do to untangle this. I am glad they have called them "experts," because if they had called them "secretaries" we should have had to go into some other language for an official title for them.

Mr. LODGE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Connally	Johnson, Colo.	Smith

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, in conformance with the provisions of rule 40, I give notice in writing that I shall move to suspend the rules in order that I may offer an amendment to the bill, and I send the notice to the desk.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I deferred making the point of order until after disposition was made of the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will not the Senator permit the notice to be read? Is there objection to that?

Mr. McNARY. As I understand the parliamentary situation, we are now discussing whether we shall agree to or reject the committee amendment.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is all.

Mr. McNARY. This proposal follows, and is in anticipation of what I stated a while ago, that I was going to make a point of order to the substance of the amendment to be offered by the Senator from Tennessee on behalf of the committee. I maintain that if the committee amendment shall be defeated, this proposal will be wholly out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. This is merely a notice which the Senator from Tennessee desires to give.

Mr. McKELLAR. I withdraw it for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee withdraws the notice, and the question is now on agreeing to the amendment of the committee on page 33, line 2.

Mr. McKELLAR. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk called the roll.

Mr. MINTON. I announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMATHERS] are absent from the Senate because of illness.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. I have a general pair with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. BRIDGES]. In his absence, I transfer that pair to the Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] and will vote. I vote "yea." I am not advised how either Senator would vote if present and voting.

Mr. AUSTIN. My colleague Mr. GIBSON is absent because of illness in his family. He has a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY].

Mr. MCNARY (after having voted in the negative). Again announcing my pair and transfer, I permit my vote to stand.

Mr. BROWN. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea." The senior Senator from Utah, if present, would vote "nay."

Mr. STEWART. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. HOLMAN], who I understand, if present, would vote "nay." I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] and vote "yea."

So the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I move that the vote by which the amendment was rejected be reconsidered.

Mr. TOBEY. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I think it is fair to assume that the Senator from Tennessee does not intend to propose his amendment.

Mr. MCKELLAR. No; it is not at all necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was withdrawn.

Mr. MCKELLAR. It has been withdrawn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not now before the Senate. The clerk will state the next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of the Census," on page 39, line 4, after the word "services", to strike out "$120,000" and insert "$100,000", so as to read:

Salaries and expenses, Social Security Act: For salaries and necessary expenses for searching census records and supplying information incident to carrying out the provisions of the Social Security Act, approved August 14, 1935 (42 U. S. C., ch. 7), including personal services in the District of Columbia; binding records; supplies; services; $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Title III—Department of Justice—Office of the Attorney General," on page 53, line 20, after the name "Department of Justice," to strike out "including traveling expenses of probation officers and their clerks but"; on page 54, line 1, before the word "Provided", to strike out "$812,000" and insert "$589,000"; in line 2, after the word "exceed", to strike out "$7,500" and insert "$3,500"; in line 4, after the name "Bureau of Prisons", to strike out "and the Probation Service", and in line 6, after the name "Attorney General", to strike out the colon and the following additional proviso: "Provided further, That United States probation officers may be allowed, in lieu of actual expenses of transportation, not to exceed 3 cents per mile for the use of their own automobiles for transportation when traveling on official business within the city limits of their official station"; so as to read:

Traveling expenses: For all necessary traveling expenses, Department of Justice, not including traveling expenses otherwise payable under any appropriations for "Federal Bureau of Investigation", "Salaries and expenses of marshals", "Fees of witnesses", and "Penal and correctional institutions" (except as otherwise hereinbefore provided), $589,000: Provided, That this sum shall be available, in an amount not to exceed $3,500, for expenses of attendance at meetings concerned with the work of the Bureau of Prisons when incurred on the written authorization of the Attorney General.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Prisons", on page 58, line 11, after the word "prisoners", to strike out "$318,000" and insert "$303,000"; so as to read:

Salaries: For salaries in the District of Columbia and elsewhere in connection with the supervision of the maintenance and care of United States prisoners, $303,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Miscellaneous appropriations," on page 59, line 9, after the name "District of Columbia", to strike out "$1,250,000" and insert "$1,400,000", so as to read:

Enforcement of antitrust and kindred laws: For the enforcement of antitrust and kindred laws, including experts at such rates of compensation as may be authorized or approved by the Attorney General, except that the compensation paid to any person employed hereunder shall not exceed the rate of $10,000 per annum, including personal services in the District of Columbia, $1,400,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill with regard to this item on page 59, which proposes to increase the sum provided for the enforcement of the antitrust and kindred laws by $150,000 over and above the amount provided in the bill as it passed the other House.

There is great interest in the activity of the antitrust division, and I am particularly concerned in the effort which it has been putting forth in relation to the enforcement of the antitrust laws insofar as they affect the dairy industry. The Senator may be aware of the fact that an effort was made in the House of Representatives to increase the item for the purpose of making certain that a sufficient amount of money would be available to the Antitrust Division to carry forward their activities in relation to the enforcement of the antitrust laws, as affecting the dairy industry.

Representative HULL, of Wisconsin, offered an amendment on the floor of the House providing for the appropriation of $100,000 additional in order to make certain that the work of the Antitrust Division in relation to the particular phase of its work to which I have alluded could be effectively and vigorously prosecuted.

I wish to ask the Senator from Tennessee a question. With the increase of $150,000 which the committee has made in this item, can we be assured that there will be a sufficient amount of money available to the antitrust division so that its activities in relation to the dairy industry and the alleged monopoly practices which exist in it, can be carried forward, assuming the item is retained?

Mr. McKELLAR. I, myself, have no doubt about it. The Senator will find on page 133 of the hearings, and on the following pages, a full discussion of the entire matter by Mr. Arnold, the head of the Antitrust Division in the Department of Justice. As I recall, he asked for one and a half million dollars, and the committee, after most careful consideration, finally concluded to give him $1,400,000, which is $150,000 above the amount approved by the House.

Mr. Arnold and those with him made an excellent case. They testified, as the Senator will see from the hearings, concerning the dairy or milk cases in Chicago and elsewhere. In connection with those cases they cited the success of the Department in doing away with the evil customs and practices which existed in the industry. I, myself, do not believe that an increase of $150,000 will give Mr. Arnold ample money to carry on the work he has begun. Unquestionably, he has made fine progress. I think there were two or three items with respect to which there was an increase, and this was one of the few items where an increase was given, because the committee believed that Mr. Arnold would enforce the law to the benefit of the dairy industry, as well as to the benefit of other industries in similar situations.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. With that assurance from the Senator from Tennessee, Mr. President, I shall not offer an amendment to increase the amount. I am very much interested, as I have indicated, in the work of the Department being efficiently carried forward insofar as it relates to the dairy industry, and I will say also, while I am on my feet, that I think the testimony shows that the antitrust division has collected in fines and in judgments about $4 for every dollar which has been appropriated to it.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; not quite that much. The amount that was collected last year in the way of fines was $2,400,000 in round figures. Unquestionably, as the Senator recalls, for a number of years, the provisions of the antitrust law were not vigorously enforced, but they have been vigorously and effectively enforced lately. Many of those prosecuted have come forward and agreed to conform to the law and not engage in practices in violation of the antitrust law. I will read the amounts collected in fines——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. From what page?

Mr. McKELLAR. From page 96 of the record.

Mr. Arnold in testifying said this:

> I can show you the results concretely in terms of fines. To be sure, we do not run this division to collect fines, but for the period 1929 to 1936, when you appropriated the bare essentials for the office here in Washington, $300,000 a year, we collected only $73,000 in fines. Last year you appropriated $1,300,000, and in 6 months' time we had collected, up to the first of the year, $2,430,000 in fines. That is nearly 4 to 1.

He says it is nearly 4 to 1. He figures only 6 months' time. He figures that at the same rate it would be 4 to 1.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That was the statement I had in mind when I referred to the collection of fines.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes. As a matter of fact, what they actually collected in the first 6 months was $1,430,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I appreciate the Senator's statement.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. MINTON. What amendment is pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 59, beginning in line 9.

Mr. MINTON. I wish to offer an amendment to the committee amendment, on page 59, line 15, to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$7,500." In referring to the committee amendment it will be seen that it provides that if the Department desires to employ anyone in this service, and to pay him out of this appropriation a salary of $5,000 or more per year, it can only be done if such person is appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The amendment I offer is to raise that limit to $7,500.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the amendment is in order.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will not agree to that amendment to the amendment. I see no reason in the world why the limit should not be $5,000 instead of $7,500. The committee after very careful consideration fixed the amount at $5,000, and I think that figure should be retained. By the way, I think in a number of other appropriation bills the sum of $5,000 was fixed, though in this particular bill last year it was $7,500. I think the bills ought to be made as uniform as possible, and I believe $5,000 is the proper limit.

Mr. MINTON. I ask the Senator from Tennessee if it is the uniform practice to make the limit $5,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is not the uniform practice, but I hope it will become the uniform practice. Five thousand dollars is the amount that is usually put in the appropriation bills.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. MINTON. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let me ask the Senator if it is not a fact that in the work of the Antitrust Division some of the attorneys do not remain with the Division a great length of time, but come in and work on specific cases, and when the cases are disposed of, go back to their private practice. If I am correct in that assumption, it seems to me it is an additional argument in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, because it should not be necessary, in order that a man may be retained to do specific work in the Department, that his nomination should have to come before the Senate and be confirmed.

Mr. MINTON. The Senator is correct in his observation. We have distinguished lawyers in various divisions of the Department of Justice who are perfectly capable of making proper selections of lawyers in minor capacities there. It does not seem to me to be at all necessary for the Senate to concern itself about the approval of the nomination of anyone having a salary of $7,500 or under. Frequently the head of the Division, as in the case of the Antitrust Division, wishes to employ a lawyer whom he knows, whose ability he knows, and he wants to set him to work immediately, because it may be necessary to do so. As the Senator from Wisconsin has observed, many of these attorneys are not employed for any fixed period, and are frequently employed for only a short time. But the Department may have knowledge of some lawyer who is particularly qualified for a special job, and it may be necessary that he be put to work on that job immediately. Therefore, it should have authority to employ that kind of a lawyer and put him into the field immediately. instead of having to wait to have his nomination confirmed by the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. He can always be given a temporary appointment.

Mr. MINTON. But he could not be paid out of this appropriation, temporarily or permanently, if he received $7,500 or more, unless his appointment was approved by the Senate. All I say is that that amount should be raised from $5,000 to $7,500.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana to the committee amendment on page 59, line 15.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 59, beginning in line 9.

Mr. LEE. Mr. President, I had intended to make a statement in support of the increased appropriation for the Antitrust Division, but it seems unnecessary to take the time of the Senate to do so. Therefore, in order that the material which has been furnished me by the Department may be available to the Senate, I ask unanimous consent to have a statement printed in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The statement presented by Mr. LEE is as follows:

PROTECT THE CONSUMER BY FREEDOM OF TRADE BETWEEN THE STATES

The narrow question before us is how much we are willing to appropriate for the Sherman Act. The real issue is whether this Congress is willing to do anything to protect the American consumer. Holding down the appropriation of the Antitrust Division is not an economy measure. It does not mean that the Government will spend less than if this appropriation were increased by another quarter million. It means just the opposite. For every dollar we cut off this appropriation we lose more than a dollar of fines from violators of the law. Already this year the United States Treasury has collected in fines from violators of the antitrust laws more than three times the amount which the Antitrust Division has spent in preparing and trying the cases. Of course, we would not appropriate money just to collect these fines, but if we think the law is worth enforcing economy does not offer us a shadow of an excuse for not enforcing it. It not only costs us nothing to enforce it, it costs us less than nothing.

We are preparing to spend nearly a billion dollars for commodities in industrial markets highly organized and shot through with restraints of trade. The only insurance the consumer has to prevent that spending from raising prices instead of lowering them is the maintenance of competition in industry.

In many industries, particularly the equipment industries, prices have been kept high for years on the plea that with so small a volume a high price was necessary to prevent bankruptcy. In some of these industries in which markets are controlled we have increased volume by spending and subsidies, but the consumer has seen prices rise with increased volume instead of falling. It has not worked. No one is satisfied. And today the consumer is demanding as the first obligation of Government the removal of artificial restraints and trade barriers so that he can buy in a free market.

The consumer today wants tangible evidence of some practical action to protect his interests. The experience of the past year, particularly in the building industry, has shown the consumer, that the best practical action to protect his interest is in the Nation-wide enforcement of the Sherman Act. He is today making his voice heard in support of that enforcement in the distribution of other necessities.

The American consumer has been unorganized and unrepresented for a long time. He is beginning to organize today. He is demanding representation. He is tired of seeing a rising prosperity suddenly end in what the economists call an inventory boom which he knows simply means unsold goods and will result in unused productive capacity. And it is for that reason that this small appropriation has a significance which goes far beyond its dollars and cents figures. It is an attempt to revive a traditional economic policy which has been too long forgotten—the policy of maintaining free competitive enterprise. Indeed, this appropriation is one of the few gestures, and perhaps the only gesture, which is being made by this Congress in the consumer's defense. We are appropriating billions for subsidies, for national defense, for public works, for relief, for Government guaranties of private credit, but most of this money must inevitably be spent in highly organized industrial markets, and all we are willing to give to protect the American consumers from the extortions which inevitably arise from large purchases in highly organized markets is less than a million and a half; and there are some who wish to cut down even that insignificant amount.

The consumer has been kicked around long enough. He has suffered long enough from the idea that economic salvation lies in restricting production and raising the prices which he must pay. He has cheerfully submitted to paying taxes for Government subsidies and Government credit given for the benefit of agriculture, housing, industry, public works, and relief, in the hope that they would be a stimulus to greater volume of production and thus give him more of the goods which he needs at the lower prices which increased volume should afford him. He is becoming tired of seeing those very subsidies and that very credit used to subsidize inefficient methods of distribution; to perpetuate the power of those who are restraining free trade in America.

The consumer has seen what has happened in industry after industry. The most familiar example of the kind of thing the consumer is tired of is found in the construction industry. In 1936, under the influence of Government subsidy and credit in the construction industry, the volume of housing doubled—the housing boom looked to be on the way. Everybody hoped for the increased purchasing power which that vast area of possible employment might give. What happened? In spite of the fact that there was no scarcity of labor or materials, in 10 of our principal cities the cost of a house to the ordinary consumer went up 25 percent. The ordinary citizen on a low income, needing a roof over his head, was set back on his heels 25 percent of the entire cost of the house because of this greater volume of subsidized production. Thus the consumer had to pay for the housing program in two ways—first, out of increased taxes, and second, out of increased prices. The consumer is learning that he is in danger of being consumed himself. He thinks that if he pays these taxes it is enough without also paying increased prices. Today he wants the restraints of trade which create that situation removed from the industry. He sees no reason for the hundreds of petty exactions which organized groups in the building industry are taking out of his pocket. He does not understand why subsidized housing should not reduce the prices instead of raising them.

AID TO FARMERS

One of the greatest groups of consumers is the farmers. Farmers are unorganized. When prices drop they must produce more in order to buy the goods they need, and this makes prices drop still further. To meet this unbalanced situation the farmer has been getting, and is probably going to continue to get, temporary subsidies to help him out of a situation where farm products are losing their value as a medium of exchange for manufactured goods. The farmer is observing, however, that his own subsidies are reacting on the prices of things he would buy in the same way that they reacted in the building industry. He needs gasoline to run his farm. He observes the great oil companies claiming the right to put a floor under gasoline prices. Gasoline sold at prices which he can afford to pay is called distress gasoline and removed as a competitive evil. At the same time he observes that the price of the can in which his product is sold represents 40 percent of the wholesale price of the entire product, and 15 percent to 25 percent of the retail price. He sees the price of bread go up for no reason that can be explained by the law of supply and demand.

The farmer in his capacity as a consumer is not an unreasonable man. He is not opposed to size in industry where that size passes on the efficiency of mass production to consumers. He only thinks that he has a right to demand that the privileges of large organizations should be limited to those who use them for cheaper distribution, and that such privileges should be taken away from those who use them to erect an economic toll bridge across the road of trade.

The consumer needs protection today as he never needed it before because we have passed and are probably going to pass laws, which if abused will throw our price structure still further out of balance. We are giving special privileges to retailers. We must see that they are not abused. The Government is going to make huge purchases for war materials. We must see that they are a stimulus to industry instead of a further burden on consumers. There is only one practical way of removing barriers to the distribution of goods, and that is to take up one industry at a time and one product at a time. There is only one instrument which has survived the test of 50 years which permits us to take up one industry at a time and that is the Sherman Antitrust Act.

I feel it is my duty as a representative of an agricultural State to attempt to get a consumer movement started in this country to get consumers to realize what the freeing of competitive forces and the removal of obstacles to free trade within the States will do in giving them more goods. I want to see this movement started with respect to the necessities which the American public must buy and those which the Government must buy. I want to see this done in housing. I want to see it done in war materials. As a representative of the farmers I would like to see commenced on a broad front the removal of restraints from the distribution of food products. And finally, I want to see the trade barriers between the States, which I believe to be in violation of our antitrust laws, removed by effective prosecution.

For the first time in our history we are beginning to enforce the Sherman Act, and with that enforcement is coming a public response which proves to me that the consumers are waking up. I am informed by a valuable agency, the Consumers' Counsel, that there are over 1,400 active consumer organizations in the country today. I want to see them educated as to what free trade within the borders of America can do for them. I am not talking about protective tariffs against other nations. That is not involved here. Whatever our policy on such questions may be, I think no reasonable man can deny the necessity of free exchange of goods within our own borders without paying tribute to unnecessary organizations which use their power against the interests of the consuming public.

This broad question of maintaining our traditional American policy is involved in the appropriation which I am discussing. The appropriation is not sufficient but at least it is a start. To spend hundreds of millions for war materials in a highly organized market without at least this protection is incredible folly. To spend money for subsidies, or credit, in an organized market and expect them to have a stimulating effect, without at least this insurance, is plain stupidity. In the last war we went through the experience of letting price fixing by private organizations get out of control. I know of no excuse for our going throught it again.

LOWERS COST OF HOUSING

There can be no doubt that the American people want the antitrust laws enforced. In the half century since the passage of the Sherman Act there has never been a time when either political party platform has mentioned the antitrust laws except to endorse them and to call for their enforcement. Last year Congress gave the Division enough money for the first time to make a systematic attack upon restraints of trade that affect housing. The public acclaim of that work has been practically unanimous.

Why do the American people want the antitrust laws enforced? There are two reasons. The first is that they know from the point of view of their own incomes and their own jobs that any failure to enforce these laws is a false economy. It is estimated that within the last year the buyers of goods in seven industries have been saved about $270,000,000 as a result of antitrust investigations. Suppose that these estimates are exaggerated by as much as 250 percent. The American people are still getting back, in these seven industries alone, $100 for each dollar spent by the Division. In the city of Pittsburgh last year two low-cost housing units were being built, practically identical in size and specifications. The Antitrust Division began to investigate price-fixing rings in the building industry after the bids had been let on the first but before they were let on the second. As a result of its work, the cost per room in the second unit will be $188 less than the first—a total of $1,100,000 saving in the cost of the project. Every family which wants to build a house and every family which rents one and knows that the rents are affected by the cost of construction, understands that its housing bill will be lower when houses are built without conspiracies to fix prices. On this one Pittsburgh project the saving was nearly as large as the whole appropriation for the Antitrust Division. Is it any wonder the American people think it would be false economy not to enforce the antitrust laws? Is it any wonder that newspapers throughout the country have carried editorials of alarm and remonstrance for fear the housing campaign of the Antitrust Division might be endangered through lack of funds?

What is true of housing is true of many other things that the American people buy. During the last year the Antitrust Division has been investigating fertilizer and the basic raw materials of which it is made. Potash is one of these materials. Nearly half of our supply of potash in recent years has come from foreign sources, most of which are cut off by the war. During the first World War, when we were far more dependent upon foreign supplies, the price of potash went up from about $45 a ton to more than $400 a ton. The recent investigation by the Antitrust Division has been directly responsible for the fact that domestic producers have announced that although imports have been cut off by the war blockade, the price of potash to the farmer will not be increased. It has been estimated that an increase of from $10 to $15 per ton might have been anticipated and that the savings to the farmers because of this pledge of the domestic producers amounts to from four to six million dollars, three or four times the total budget of the Antitrust Division. Is it surprising that American farmers believe that it will be false economy to deny the Antitrust Division the money it needs to keep prices down?

The cases I have discussed come from work already in progress. The effect already accomplished in such investigations as those of housing and fertilizer will be dissipated if the Division's appropriation is not increased. Why is it that in Pittsburgh when the electrical contractors were indicted, prices fell not only on electrical work but on sand and gravel, lumber, plumbing, and other building supplies? It is because people in these other trades knew that unless they cleaned house it would only be a matter of time before they, too, would be called before a grand jury. The deterrent effect of antitrust prosecutions depends upon the fact that the Government stands ready to undertake more prosecutions if they should be necessary. But the Antitrust Division has now started so many cases and indicted so many people that its present appropriation will scarcely be adequate to try the cases that are already in progress. To renew this appropriation unchanged is to offer a practical guaranty to the groups that have not yet been indicted that they have nothing to fear. It is to give them an assurance that the lightning will not strike again for at least 1 more year. Indeed, it is to prevent the trial of some of those who have already been indicted or investigated, for the Division estimates that at least a million and a half dollars will be needed merely to carry on the work on cases already under way. There is no simpler way to change the great investigations of housing and fertilizer from constructive methods of restoring competition in whole industries into mere punitive activities against a small number of unfortunate individuals. It is false economy to destroy the effect of the work already done.

But even in the housing investigation the Division is still doing only part of its job. It is also a false economy not to appropriate enough money to meet the more pressing needs for the same kind of work in other cities. Unless the appropriation is increased, important cities which have not yet been reached by the effects of the housing campaign will continue to suffer from restraints upon building which make low-cost housing impossible. At points as far apart as Atlanta, Ga., and Great Falls, Mont., the Antitrust Division has been urged to investigate housing conditions by the local housing authority, which feels that its efforts to provide low-cost housing are being intolerably handicapped by cost-raising combinations. In Portland, Oreg., the school board and the chamber of commerce have both asked the Division to investigate; in Peoria, Ill., a request has come from the local realty board and the local manufacturers' and merchants' association. In addition to organized appeals such as these, the Division constantly receives appeals from groups and individuals in the building industry. At present such appeals have to be filed without action because the Division has not men enough to investigate them.

SAVES CONSUMERS MILLIONS OF DOLLARS

Unless the appropriation is increased the Division cannot break up the combinations which raise the price of milk in other cities as it broke up those in Chicago. After the milk rings in Chicago were indicted under the Sherman Act, the price of milk there fell from 2 to 4 cents a quart, saving Chicago consumers at least $7,000,000 annually. After the judge dismissed the indictment the retail price rose again, and after the Supreme Court reversed him, the price once more went down. Today most Chicago consumers are getting their milk at least 2 cents cheaper without any reduction in the price paid to the farmer. Consumers in Lincoln, St. Louis, Los Angeles, Pittsburgh, Birmingham, and New Orleans are just as anxious as those in Chicago to buy their milk without paying an unnecessary toll to organized middlemen.

It is also false economy to prevent antitrust investigations from being extended to other basic industries. The Division should be allowed to investigate not only housing but the other major items on which the consumer spends his income. Consider food. From 15 to 25 percent of the retail value of canned foods is represented by the cost of the container alone. There are complaints of price-fixing by canning companies, can manufacturers, bread manufacturers, cheese manufacturers, and milk distributors. The income of the farm producer today is far below its prewar parity in spite of special efforts of the Government to help him. The food manufacturing and distributing industries are taking an ever larger share of the consumer dollar. From time to time there have been sporadic prosecutions of particular groups—meat packers in 1920, poultry dealers in 1924 and 1930, wholesale grocers in 1924, peanut shellers and fish wholesalers in 1925 and 1933, bakers in 1926, candy jobbers in 1928, sugar refiners in 1931, and cornstarch manufacturers in 1932. But there has never been a systematic effort to deal with the restraints that raise the cost of food as the Antitrust Division is now dealing with the restraints that raise the cost of housing. The American people, who annually spend about $14,000,000,000 for food, would not regard $100,000 to do this work as an extravagance. Rather, they will regard the refusal to do it as a false economy.

The consumer has no money to spend in paying tribute to monopolies and combinations in restraint of trade. He wants the antitrust laws enforced as a simple and practical way of increasing his standard of living. It is just as important to him not to be unreasonably taxed by arbitrary monopolies and private combinations as it is not to be unreasonably taxed by his Government.

When any considerable number of such combinations are engaged in restraining trade, their restricted output destroys jobs and cuts off workers' incomes, their restricted purchases of supplies reduce the farmers' market, and their high prices make it impossible for the consumer to buy. The ordinary man tries to make ends meet with a smaller income to be spent at higher prices. Such restrictive combinations create idle equipment, unemployment, and unsold inventories. They intensify the need for unemployment relief and so heighten the problems of taxes and unbalanced budgets. They lower the farmers' selling prices and raise his buying prices and thus require farm subsidies which unbalance the budget still further. The community's inability to buy becomes a reason for business to discharge more men, paying less for raw materials, and keep prices high in order to break even on a low volume of production. The unemployment relief and farm subsidies become an argument for lack of confidence in Government spending policies and so for a further refusal to produce goods in quantity at low prices. The problems of economic balance and of Government finance are difficult enough at best; but when they are complicated by widespread restraints which stop commerce they become insoluble. The American consumer realizes that enforcement of the antitrust laws is a necessary part of any policy which is to take consumers off relief and subsidies and give them again a steadily rising national income and a rising standard of living.

It is not only the consumer interest which demands the removal of obstacles to trade in the United States. To the American farmers a business community which restrains trade is one which cuts down the volume of buying of farm crops, which combines to buy farm produce at low prices, and which then combines to sell the farmer the finished product at high prices. The Division is now investigating the tobacco industry to discover why the net profits of a few large tobacco manufacturers are from 33 percent to 100 percent as large as the gross income from tobacco received by farmers in the four leading tobacco States. The Farm Bureau Federation recently expressed the farmer's desire for enforcement of the antitrust laws by adopting a resolution heartily commending such enforcement, whether against labor, industry, or agriculture.

The interests of the American workingman require that the antitrust laws be enforced. Combinations that restrain trade are combinations that limit the number of jobs and increase the amount of unemployment; and when unemployment is large, wage rates are vulnerable. So long as a high level of industrial activity creates more jobs and higher wages than does a stagnant industry, the interests of labor will be served by enforcing the antitrust laws.

Finally, the interests of businessmen require the enforcement of the antitrust laws. A single combination to restrain trade looks attractive to its members, but similar combinations by other businessmen do not. In a field such as housing, in which restraints have become general, every group in the industry has been urging the Antitrust Division to end an intolerable situation. No one has a more direct interest in freedom to do business than businessmen themselves. It was a businessman who complained to the Antitrust Division that he was not allowed to buy building materials and had to have them bootlegged to him at night by a friend whose purchases were acceptable to the ring. It was businessmen who told the Antitrust Division that they were not allowed to engage in the business of glazing wood sash in Cleveland because a single concern had been set up there to monopolize that market and no other sash would be installed. It is businessmen such as these who look to the Antitrust Division to preserve their freedom to buy, their freedom to sell, and their freedom to set their own prices. When a broad campaign like that in building offers a chance of reviving the whole industry, the businessmen involved gain as directly as the consumer, and the entire business community gains from the increased markets which result from more jobs and a higher level of production.

INDUSTRY AND CONSUMER BOTH GAIN

Many parts of American public policy involve a conflict of interest between those who are hurt and those who are helped by the Government's action. The antitrust laws are not of this character. For 50 years the ideal of the antitrust laws has furnished a common ground for American political groups and economic interests, but during most of that time this ideal was expressed in ceremony rather than in administration. Within the last 2 years we have seen the development of a plan to enforce the antitrust laws effectively. Within the last year we have seen the first examples of how that plan works and we have found that it is practical, that it gets results quickly, and that it wins general support. Only one question remains. Do we want to carry out the plan or do we want to find some way of running away from it? To limit the work of the Antitrust Division to what is now being done is probably an even more effective way of defeating the enforcement of the antitrust laws than to cut the appropriation, for the public may not notice the first and it would certainly notice and resent the latter. The enforcement of these laws means that the Antitrust Division must continue to grow until it has a large enough staff to deal with several major industries at once and to continue to watch those in which it has already restored competition. To stop that growth is to reject the laws at the very time when there is a chance to make them effective. It is to say that we want to make antitrust law enforcement once more a mere ceremony; we do not want to make it a fact.

This is the simple issue that lies before us today. Shall we say we only believe in the antitrust laws so long as we are sure they will not be effective? Or shall we provide for a further step toward restoring and preserving competition in our major industries and thereby save money both for the Government of the United States and for the American people?

I believe that removal of restraints which block the exchange of goods between farmers and organized industry, and the distribution of goods to low-income groups constitutes one of the most important domestic issues which confront us today. I think that it is time to stop talking and get down to the tiresome, detailed, but necessary, job of examining one industry at a time by the case by case method of our common law judicial process which has developed in 50 years through the Sherman Act. And I want to do my part in helping the consumers of America realize the importance of this issue.

The Antitrust Division's appropriation is unlike most of the others with which we have to deal. We are appropriating, not for a going concern, but for one which is just getting started. Until 4 years ago so few people and so little money were used to enforce the antitrust laws that the so-called enforcement was a mere ceremonial. Not until last year did we give the Antitrust Division as much money as we give to the National Capital Park and Planning Commission, or the Smithsonian Institution. Even with the present appropriation we are asking the Division to enforce the antitrust laws throughout the United States on less than half the sum we appropriate for the Police Department of the District of Columbia. The coordinated investigations of major industries, which ought always to have been the center of the Division's work, were only begun last year. Every lawyer knows that it costs more to try an antitrust case than to investigate it. We committed ourselves last year to a scale of investigation which automatically calls for an increased appropriation this year to finish the work. The question here is not economy. Enforcement actually brings in revenue. The only question is, Do you want these laws enforced or do you not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 59, lines 9 to 17, inclusive.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will state the next committee amendment.

The next amendment was, on page 61, line 7, after the word "elsewhere", to strike out "$375,000" and insert "$325,000", so as to read:

Salaries and expenses, veterans' insurance litigation: For salaries and expenses incident to the defense of suits against the United States under section 19 of the World War Veterans' Act, 1924, approved June 7, 1924, as amended and supplemented, or the compromise of the same under the Independent Offices Appropriation Act, 1934, approved June 16, 1933, including office expenses, lawbooks, supplies, equipment, stenographic reporting services, by contract or otherwise, including notarial fees or like services and stenographic work in taking depositions at such rates of compensation as may be authorized or approved by the Attorney General, printing and binding, the employment of experts at such rates of compensation as may be authorized or approved by the Attorney General, and personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, $325,000.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I wish to inquire of the committee what facts were taken into consideration in reducing the appropriation by $50,000. The Bureau of the Budget recommended $425,000 for this particular service. The House reduced that amount by $50,000. The Senate committee has reduced it by another $50,000. What were the facts justifying the further reduction?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I shall be very happy to state what the committee had in mind.

The war-risk insurance business has been dwindling very rapidly in the past few years. Several years ago every court in the country was full of war-risk insurance suits, and the Department asked for and obtained an appropriation of about $300,000 to defend such suits in the various courts of the country. Almost every district court in the country was full of them.

They have now decreased to the point where there are very few cases. There are only 1,231 cases pending in the entire country. While the cases have greatly dwindled in number, the appropriation has gone down exceedingly slowly. After a most careful examination of the witnesses in connection with the item, and a careful examination of the proof, we came to the conclusion that $325,000 was ample to defend the remaining 1,231 war-risk insurance cases.

Some of the cases have been pending for 10 years. Hardly a lawsuit in any court in which the case has been pending for 10 years is of very much value to the litigants. A plea of laches could probably be brought in any such case. The cases are not as important as they were. Last year the committee gave notice to those who had charge of this division that the appropriations must come down. We believe that the district attorneys in the several districts should handle every one of the 1,231 cases. A small organization in Washington is needed to give the facts, although I think the Veterans' Bureau has the facts. The Department of Justice engaged in war-risk cases in Washington, D. C., must obtain the facts from the Veterans' Bureau; and there is no reason why the Veterans' Bureau cannot give the information directly to the district attorney in each district, and thereby save the Government quite a large sum.

If there ever was justification for the reduction of an appropriation, the lack of business in this case is ample justification. I know one district which was said a few years ago to have more war-risk insurance cases than any other district in the country. Today that district has two cases.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I wish to submit for the RECORD a statement which has been furnished to me by the Department of Justice with reference to this particular item. The statement is as follows:

The Bureau of War Risk Litigation was organized as a Division in the Department of Justice in September 1933 pursuant to Executive Order No. 6166. Its function is to defend suits against the United States on contracts of war-risk term and United States Government life insurance, authorized by the War Risk Insurance Act of October 6, 1917 (40 Stat. 398), revised and reenacted by the World War Veterans' Act of June 7, 1924 (43 Stat. 607), and subsequent amendments. Prior to September 1933 this litigation was largely handled by the Veterans' Administration and United States attorneys. Since that date sole responsibility for the defense of this character of litigation has been fixed in the Department of Justice.

There were approximately 11,800 cases pending when the Bureau of War Risk Litigation took the work over, and 3,336 new cases have been instituted since then. Over 13,500 cases have been disposed of by this Bureau during the little more than 6 years it has functioned, of which approximately 88.7 percent were won by the Government, representing a saving to the Government of approximately $135,899,446.40.

There were 1,231 cases pending as of January 1, 1940, involving an estimated liability of approximately $16,987,800. New suits are being brought at the rate of 20 to 30 each month. In general each case involves a minimum contractual liability of $13,800. In this connection it is important to note that there were 606,071 insurance contracts in force as of June 30, 1939, involving a potential liability to the Government of $2,562,353,868, aside from those now in litigation, and it is reasonable to expect that many more suits will arise from these policies.

The Bureau is composed of a Director, a Trial Division, a Compromise Division, and an Appeals Division. There are 73 attorneys and 79 stenographers, clerks, and messengers employed in the Bureau, Central Office, and field, representing a monthly pay roll of $37,061.21.

The appropriation for the current fiscal year (1940) was $485,000. The Bureau of the Budget recommended $425,000 for the next fiscal year. The House reduced this to $375,000 and the Senate committee has recommended a further cut to $325,000. This reduction, if adopted, will necessitate the termination of the services of from 25 to 40 persons. It will also mean fewer cases can be disposed of during the next year, which means a delay to those veterans entitled to receive insurance benefits. It may also mean insufficient preparation and perhaps inadequate representation of the Government in those cases which are tried. The loss of five cases would more than offset the saving represented by the $50,000 cut proposed by the Senate committee.

In voting on this amendment I think the Senate should have the benefit of the statement prepared by the Department of Justice.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, before the vote is taken, let me say that in this Division in 1937 there were 75 attorneys, and there were 5,125 cases all told, or an average of 68 cases for each attorney; in 1938 there were 71 attorneys and 3,874 cases, or 54 cases for each attorney; in 1939 there were 73 attorneys and 2,679 cases, or 36 cases for each attorney; in 1940 there were 73 attorneys and 1,663 cases in all, or 23 cases for each attorney.

Most of us have practiced law and some of us very vigorously. I should feel almost ashamed, as a trial lawyer, if I could not try more than 23 cases a year, and yet that would be all that would be imposed upon each of the attorneys in this Division. The number would be even less than that. I believe next year there would be about 18 cases for each lawyer if the appropriation were made substantially what it is for the current year.

I very much hope the reduction will be agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall be glad to be corrected if I am in error, but my understanding is that the lawyers do not try all of the cases attributed to them. A case may be assigned to a lawyer and he may examine it and there may not be any trial.

Mr. McKELLAR. Not only that, but if a lawyer goes from Washington to Connecticut, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, or Nebraska and tries a case without regard to the local district attorney, he is doing a very doubtful piece of business for the reason that local attorneys have every advantage, and the district attorney ought to be required to try the cases. The best results are obtained when the district attorney is required to try the cases.

I suggested to those who appeared before the committee that next year they had better look to having all the work done by the local district attorneys and by the proper organization in the Bureau in Washington. I think probably in another year, if the cases follow the reductions shown by the figures for the past 4 years, the number of cases will be reduced to such an extent that there will be no necessity for any appropriation for a separate organization.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment on page 61, line 7.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 63, line 7, after the word "duties", to insert a colon and the following additional proviso: "Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the payment of any person hereafter appointed at a salary of $5,000 or more and paid from this appropriation unless such person is appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate," so as to read:

Salaries and expenses of special attorneys, and so forth: For compensation of special attorneys and assistants to the Attorney General and to United States district attorneys employed by the Attorney General to aid in special cases, and for payment of foreign counsel employed by the Attorney General in special cases, $575,000, no part of which, except for payment of foreign counsel, shall be used to pay the compensation of any persons except attorneys duly licensed and authorized to practice under the laws of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia: Provided, That the amount paid as compensation out of the funds herein appropriated to any person employed hereunder shall not exceed the rate of $10,000 per annum: Provided further, That reports be submitted to the Congress on the 1st day of July and January showing the names of the persons employed hereunder, the annual rate of compensation or amount of any fee paid to each together with a description of their duties: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the payment of any person hereafter appointed at a salary of $5,000 or more and paid from this appropriation unless such person is appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Penal and correctional institutions," on page 68, after line 14, to strike out:

Probation system, United States courts: For salaries and expenses of probation officers, as authorized by the act entitled "An act to amend the act of March 4, 1925, chapter 521, and for other purposes," approved June 6, 1930 (18 U. S. C. 726), $810,000.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I should like to explain this amendment to the Senate. Congress passed a law giving authority to the officers of administration in the judiciary, and we turned over to this organization of the judiciary certain functions previously performed by the Department of Justice. The language is merely transferred to another part of the bill. The appropriations are given to the functionaries who perform the duties under the new law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 69, line 14, after the word "sidewalks", to strike out "$1,750,000" and insert "$1,550,000", so as to read:

Support of United States prisoners: For support of United States prisoners in non-Federal institutions and in the Territory of Alaska, including necessary clothing and medical aid, discharge gratuities provided by law, and transportation to place of conviction or place of bona fide residence in the United States, or such other place within the United States as may be authorized by the Attorney General; and including rent, repair, alteration, and maintenance of buildings and the maintenance of prisoners therein, occupied under authority of sections 4 and 5 of the act of May 14, 1930 (18 U. S. C. 753c, 753d); support of prisoners becoming insane during imprisonment and who continue insane after expiration of sentence, who have no relatives or friends to whom they can be sent; shipping remains of deceased prisoners to their relatives or friends in the United States and interment of deceased prisoners whose remains are unclaimed; expenses incurred in identifying, pursuing, and returning escaped prisoners and for rewards for their recapture; and for repairs, betterments, and improvements of United States jails, including sidewalks, $1,550,000.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, while we are on page 69 may I ask the Senator from Tennessee a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. DANAHER. May I invite his attention to page 69, line 20, and ask him if there is any reason he can tell us why we should not strike out the word "hereafter" in line 20?

Let me read the provision as it would read with the word "hereafter" eliminated:

None of the funds appropriated by this title may be used to pay the compensation of any person employed as an attorney unless such person shall be duly licensed and authorized to practice as an attorney under the laws of a State, Territory, or the District of Columbia.

There is no reason, is there, may I ask the Senator from Tennessee, why we should now be hiring as attorneys persons who are not entitled to practice as such?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, there are a few men in the Department of Justice—I have forgotten just how many—who have been performing the work of lawyers for many years. My general recollection is there are fewer than 10 of them all told. The language referred to by the Senator from Connecticut has been employed in order to protect those men who have been in the Department a long time. It has no reference to anything else, except to a few men who may not have been duly licensed to practice law but who have learned the law, who have made efficient officers, and the Department of Justice did not want to turn them out; they are mostly old men who have been there for many years.

Mr. DANAHER. Then, it would be the position of the committee that from now on there should not be any such person hired?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is correct; that is the intent of the provision.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee on page 69, line 14.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 71, after line 15, to insert:

This title may be cited as the "Department of Justice Appropriation Act, 1941."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Title IV—The Judiciary—Court of Claims", on page 74, line 13, after the word "court", to strike out $127,660" and insert "$131,000", so as to read:

Salaries: Chief justice and four judges; chief clerk at not exceeding $6,500; auditor at not exceeding $5,000; and all other officers and employees of the court, $131,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Miscellaneous items of expense", on page 78, after line 17, to insert: insert:

Probation system, United States courts: For salaries and expenses of probation officers, as authorized by the act entitled "An act to amend the act of March 4, 1925, chapter 521, and for other purposes", approved June 6, 1930 (18 U. S. C. 726), $810,000: Provided, That the salary of no probation officer shall be less than $1,800 per annum nor more than $3,000 per annum: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to abridge the right of the district judges to appoint probation officers, or to make such orders as may be necessary to govern probation officers in their own courts.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 79, line 14, before the name "United States", to insert the word "ten", so as to read:

Miscellaneous expenses (other than salaries): For such miscellaneous expenses as may be authorized or approved by the Director of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts, for the United States courts and their officers, including rent of rooms for United States courts and judicial officers; supplies and equipment, including the exchange of typewriting and adding machines, for the United States courts and judicial officers, including firearms and ammunition therefor; purchase of law books, including the exchange thereof, for United States judges, and other judicial officers, including the libraries of the ten United States circuit courts of appeals, and the Federal Reporter and continuations thereto as issued, $317,000:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 80, line 3, after the name "Judiciary", to strike out "$250,000" and insert "including traveling expenses of probation officers and their clerks, $473,000: Provided, That this sum shall be available, in an amount not to exceed $4,000, for expenses of attendance at meetings concerned with the work of Federal probation when incurred on the written authorization of the Director of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts: Provided further, That United States probation officers may be allowed, in lieu of actual expenses of transportation, not to exceed 3 cents per mile for the use of their own automobiles for transportation when traveling on official business within the city limits of their official station", so as to read:

Traveling expenses: For all necessary traveling expenses, not otherwise provided for, incurred by the Judiciary, including traveling expenses of probation officers and their clerks, $473,000: Provided, That this sum shall be available, in an amount not to exceed $4,000, for expenses of attendance at meetings concerned with the work of Federal probation when incurred on the written authorization of the Director of the Administrative Office of the United States Courts: Provided further, That United States probation officers may be allowed, in lieu of actual expenses of transportation, not to exceed 3 cents per mile for the use of their own automobiles for transportation when traveling on official business within the city limits of their official station.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 80, after line 16, to insert:

As used in this act, the term "circuit court of appeals" includes the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia; the term "senior circuit judge" includes the chief justice of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia; the term "circuit judge" includes associate justice of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia; and the term "judge" includes justice.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Administrative Office of the United States Courts", on page 81, line 9, after the numerals "1223" and the parenthesis, to strike out "$177,500" and insert "$192,500", so as to read:

Salaries: For the Director of the administrative office of the United States courts, the Assistant Director, and for other personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, as may be necessary to enable the Director to carry into effect the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the administration of the United States courts, and for other purposes," approved August 7, 1939 (53 Stat. 1223), $192,500:

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee if there is in the hearings before us anywhere an explanation of the increase which appears on page 81, line 9?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is not an increase; it is merely a transfer of so much money from the Department of Justice to the Judiciary.

Mr. DANAHER. Yes; but I notice that the House reported the same transfer at $177,500 while the Senate committee recommends $192,500. I am not complaining about it; it is probably entirely correct. I merely wish to know if it is explained in the hearings.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; it is explained in the hearings. On pages 146 and 153 the Senator will find the whole transaction explained. It is merely a transfer of funds. The total amount of the bill is not increased by the change in this item.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on page 81, line 9.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Title V—General provisions", on page 83, after line 14, to insert:

SEC. 503. No part of the funds appropriated by titles III and IV for salaries of judges, the Attorney General, Assistant Attorneys General, Solicitor General, district attorneys, marshals, and clerks of court shall be used for any other purpose whatsoever, but such salaries shall be allotted out of appropriations herein made for such salaries and retained by the Department or the administrative office of the United States courts and paid to such officials severally, as and when such salaries fall due and without delay.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 83, after line 23, to insert:

SEC. 504. No part of any appropriation contained in this act shall be paid to any person for the filling of any position for which he or she has been nominated after the Senate has voted not to approve of the nomination of said person.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That completes the committee amendments as printed in the bill.

Mr. McKELLAR. By direction of the Committee on Appropriations, I offer an amendment to come in on page 3, line 23, which I ask the clerk to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, line 23, after the words "including rental and repair thereof", it is proposed to insert "translating services by contract without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (41 U. S. C. 5)."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee on behalf of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the bill is now open to amendment, is it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. LODGE. On page 6, line 10, I move to strike out the words "Union of Soviet Socialist Republics."

Mr. President, the effect of the amendment, if adopted, would be to remove the United States Ambassador from Moscow. It is simply a gesture of protest indicative of the feelings which I know are entertained by virtually all Americans.

It is not necessary for me to go into a long history of the various activities of the Soviet Union; they are extremely well known; in fact, it would be accurate to say that they are notorious.

There is every reason to believe that the Soviet Union has not lived up to the understanding which most Americans thought existed at the time our Government extended recognition to it. The removal of our ambassador from Moscow would not endanger the peace of the United States; it would be a negative act; it would not cause us to enter the struggle; it would simply put the Soviet Union on a par with Germany so far as our relations with them are concerned. We do not have an ambassador in Berlin, and it seems to me the same logic impels us to the conclusion that we should not have an ambassador in Russia.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I wish to support the proposal submitted by the able junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to withdraw the appropriation to sustain an American Ambassador in Moscow. I think it important that we keep the record straight in connection with these Soviet relationships. I confess I am somewhat perplexed to deal with what is in fact a matter of foreign policy through the medium of an amendment to an appropriation bill.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, would that come under the head, if the Senator from Michigan please, of keeping the record straight?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes. What I am about to say is that when I am confronted with the necessity of voting an appropriation to maintain an ambassador at Moscow when, in my judgment, the basis upon which we originally sent an ambassador to Moscow, the contract, so to speak, under which the recognition occurred, has been persistently and contemptuously violated, it seems to me that I must resist the appropriation for the salary of the Ambassador as the only method by which I can assert my belief that this broken contract should no longer be acknowledged by the Government of the United States. There comes a point where patience ceases to be a virtue. We cannot defend international integrity by blindly condoning its rape.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. MINTON. Does not the Senator think that that judgment lies in another branch of the Government; that after all it is not for us to say whether or not that contract has been kept, especially in the indirect manner the Senator proposes to approach it, by denying the appropriation for the salary of the Ambassador to Russia?

Mr. VANDENBERG. But the Senator ignores the fact that I must vote for or against an appropriation to sustain this Ambassador, and I am unwilling to vote for an appropriation to sustain this Ambassador for the reasons which I now intend to submit to the Senate.

Mr. MINTON. One of which is, as I understand, that the Senator does not think we should have an ambassador in Russia.

Mr. VANDENBERG. As I shall presently indicate to the Senator my attitude is based on the clear and unequivocable fact that the Litvinov-Roosevelt correspondence upon which our recognition was made contingent has not been worth a scrap of paper for the last 6 years. It might as well never have occurred—yes, better that it never occurred than that it should be an offense to the dignity and honor and to the domestic security of the United States.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to say to the Senator that I do not differ with him greatly as to the actions of the present Russian Government. I agree with the Senator that the Russian Government has violated its expressed or its implied agreement with this country when we recognized that Government some years ago, and, according to my present feelings, I would have to change my mind if I should not vote for any bill that would do away with our relationship with the present Government of Russia.

The Senator however is a member of the Foreign Relations Committee. The measure before us is an appropriation bill. I recall I think when I first came to Congress nearly 30 years ago that I voted in the other House to break off diplomatic relations with Russia. That was one of the first bills, as I recall, for which I voted early in my service in the Congress, and I am inclined to think I would vote for a similar bill now for the reasons which have been suggested in part by the Senator from Michigan. But I think the proper way to do that is for the Senator to submit a resolution and have it referred to the Foreign Relations Committee, of which I know he is a member, and not undertake to do something indirectly which should be done directly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I will yield in a moment. I thank the Senator from Tennessee for his suggestion, but I have been here long enough to be something of a realist in dealing with legislative problems. I submitted a very innocent resolution 3 or 4 weeks ago merely asking for a little information about Soviet-American relationships, and that resolution is still in a pigeonhole in the Foreign Relations Committee.

I have a pretty fair idea of how far I would get with a proposition of the pending character if I were to introduce it de novo. The same argument, intensified tenfold, would be made that I was invading the executive function, and it would have far more validity than in the present instance because it would be unrelated to a legislative function.

Not so today. Here is the exercise of a legislative function. Shall we vote $17,500 for a Moscow Ambassador? I am going to undertake to prove to you that we ought not to do any such thing, and for purely domestic reasons that touch foreign policy only as a resultant incident.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the Senator will permit me for just a moment, I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to the fact that there is very high precedent for this very action in connection with this very ministership. President Jefferson, during his first term, sent to the Senate the name of William Short as Minister to St. Petersburg, which was then the capital of Russia. The Congress of the United States, not wishing to have a Minister to St. Petersburg, refused to make an appropriation to send a Minister to St. Petersburg; and Mr. Short, not wishing to go at his own expense, did not go, and so we did not have any ministry to Russia.

Mr. VANDERBERG. I thank the Senator for his historic observation and precedent. He is always helpful.

Mr. McKELLAR. But that was not during a time of war, as I recall.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Russia was engaged in a war.

Mr. McKELLAR. But we were not.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President——

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. That seems to me to be an entirely different case. We already have an Ambassador in Russia, and failure to make this appropriation would be recalling an Ambassador. By our proposed action here we seem to me to be invading the province of the State Department and the Executive Department in determining whether or not the Ambassador who is in Russia should be recalled. That is the effect of what we would do here by not making this appropriation.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is the Senator's view. I am discussing a pending appropriation, upon which it is the responsibility of the Congress to act, and I am saying that I am unwilling to approve this particular appropriation. That is a legislative function and nothing else. That involves my legislative duty.

This proposal has not anything to do with our neutrality, as the able Senator from Massachusetts has indicated. It has not anything to do with an attempt to help some external cause, like that of Finland or Poland or any other country which is the victim of Soviet duplicity of a different character. It has to do solely with the integrity of the internal situation of the United States in respect to subversive activities within the United States; and I submit that we have a congressional right to deal with that object on its own inherent merits at any time it confronts us.

Very briefly let us see what the record is.

This whole story of American-Russian relationships starts with Secretary of State Colby, under President Wilson. Secretary Colby declined to recognize Soviet Russia in one of the most powerful state papers ever written, insisting that we dared not fraternize with a regime which openly proposed to make war upon God and upon our institutions, and particularly because it boasted that it never would keep its word if it was to its own advantage to break its word.

Secretary of State Hughes, under President Harding, declined recognition, saying:

> There is conclusive evidence that those in control at Moscow have not given up their original purpose of destroying existing governments wherever they can do so throughout the world.

President Coolidge declined recognition, saying:

> Our Government does not propose to enter into relations with another regime which refuses to recognize the sanctity of international obligations.

Secretary of State Kellogg, under President Hoover, declined recognition, saying:

> It is the conviction of the Government of the United States that relations on a basis usual between friendly nations cannot be established with a governmental entity which is the agent of a group which hold it as their mission to bring about the overthrow of the existing political and economic and social order throughout the world and to regulate their conduct with other nations accordingly.

That brings us down to 1933.

President Roosevelt concluded to end this breach and to bring Soviet Russia and the United States into diplomatic partnership; but he knew he might be dealing with potential treachery, and he sought to tie its hands. Litvinov came over and discussed the matter with the President. They exchanged a series of letters, all dated November 16, 1933. Russia readily agreed to a number of self-serving promises. She agreed to settle her debts; but the most important thing was that she agreed to quit all relationships with internal revolution inside the United States. She agreed to keep her communistic hands off the United States.

Now let us be specific about this matter. I read the Litvinov pledge to the President, the indispensable prerequisite to recognition, the price of recognition, the test of the propriety, and the continuance of recognition.

A promise—

> 1. To respect scrupulously the indisputable right of the United States to order its own life within its own jurisdiction in its own way and to refrain from interfering in any manner in the internal affairs of the United States, its Territories or possessions.
> 2. To refrain, and to restrain all persons in Government service and all organizations of the Government or under its direct or indirect control, including organizations in receipt of any financial assistance from it, from any act overt or covert liable in any way whatsoever to injure the tranquility, prosperity, order, or security of the whole or any part of the United States, its Territories or possessions, and, in particular, from any act tending to incite or encourage armed intervention, or any agitation or propaganda having as an aim the violation of the territorial integrity of the United States, its Territories or possessions, or the bringing about by force of a change in the political or social order of the whole or any part of the United States, its Territories or possessions.
> 3. Not to permit the formation or residence on its territory of any organization or group—and to prevent the activity on its territory of any organization or group, or of representatives or officials of any organization or group—which makes claim to be the Government of, or makes attempt upon the territorial integrity of the United States, its Territories or possessions; not to form, subsidize, support, or permit on its territory military organizations or groups having the aim of armed struggles against the United States, its Territories or possessions, and to prevent any recruiting on behalf of such organizations and groups.
> 4. Not to permit the formation or residence on its territory of any organization or group—and to prevent the activity on its territory of any organization or group, or of representatives or officials of any organization or group—which has as an aim the overthrow or the preparation for the overthrow of, or the bringing about by force of a change in the political or social order of the whole or any part of the United States, its Territories or possessions.

Mr. President, that pledge on November 16, 1933, repeated verbatim in a letter from the President of the United States to the Commissar of Foreign Relations of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, was the basis of our act of recognition; and there can be no question in the world about it. Without this exchange of correspondence, without these pledges, there still would have been no act of recognition.

Now let us see what happened.

It did not take long to demonstrate that the leopard had not changed its spots and that the undependable Russia of yesterday was still the undependable Russia of today and tomorrow.

First, the debt negotiations broke down. Mind you, they had agreed to negotiate a settlement of their debts. Russia owed us what is now $394,992,000. There were some desultory conversations on the subject; but on January 31, 1935, the State Department issued a statement which said, in conclusion:

> In view of the present attitude of the Soviet Government, we feel that we cannot encourage the hope that any agreement is now possible.

It never was possible. It never has been possible. There never has been any sort of an agreement. Soviet Russia is just as much of a defaulter now as she was on the pious day when she agreed to quit being a defaulter.

Thus came the first, prompt disillusionment; but that was relatively inconsequential, because there are plenty of other defaulters. But 6 months later we came to grips with reality, the thing that counts. Our State Department wrote Moscow as follows—this is Mr. Hull writing to the Commissar of Foreign Relations at Moscow:

> Under instructions from my Government I have the honor to call attention to the activities involving interference in the internal affairs of the United States which have taken place on the territory of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in connection with the Seventh All-World Congress of the Communist Internationale, and, on behalf of the Government of the United States, to lodge a most emphatic protest against—> against this flagrant violation of the pledge given by the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics on November 16, 1933, with respect to noninterference in the internal affairs of the United States.

This is 1935. Please note that the State Department in this communication refers to earlier violations of our understandings. Earlier violations—this was not the first violation. The earlier violations, whatever they were, were condoned; but here was the climax in violation, and it prophesied, according to our State Department, serious consequences. The State Department addressed the situation in stern language.

Russia dismissed the protest as meaning nothing. It had what it wanted, and it was not concerned with subsequent events. It wrote the State Department a curt dismissal of our entire challenge. Whereupon the State Department issued the following statement, from which I quote only in part:

> The American Government having previously made oral complaints of failure by the Soviet Government to carry out its pledge, and being deeply concerned over the growing instability of international relationships and the dangerous consequences thereof to peace and economic recovery, sought most earnestly in its note of August 25, to impress upon the Soviet Government the sanctity of its pledge, to the end that there might be between the two Nations continued development of friendly and official relations and valuable collaboration in many beneficial ways. When in its reply the Soviet Government indicated an intention entirely to disregard its promise to prevent such activities as those complained of, it struck a severe blow at the fabric of friendly relations between the two countries.

Two weeks ago I offered a resolution asking for submission officially from the Executive of an answer to the question whether or not at the present time the record shows that the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics had fulfilled the obligations upon which recognition was based. I repeat, that resolution is still in a committee pigeonhole. But the State Department, over the signature of Secretary Hull, did not hesitate frankly and significantly to write the Committee on Foreign Relations a very illuminating letter. In response to my resolution the State Department referred back to this 1935 episode, in its letter of 2 weeks ago, and said that it had made an irrefutable case against Moscow. Irrefutable, but, alas, again nothing happened. We swallowed the offense, and carried on in our injured innocence. The offense, mind you, was an assault upon the domestic security of our internal institutions. The offense was, in effect, a conspiracy to overthrow the Government of the United States by force.

Then came 1936. Rear Admiral J. K. Taussig, testifying before the House Committee on Appropriations, said:

Members of the Third International are very active in the United States in furtherance of their plan for world revolution, which includes the overthrow of our present form of government.

Please do not mistake me; they are not seriously worrying me with their plans to overthrow our Government by force. We shall take care of that. That is not the point. The point is that our recognition was based upon a contract which has been torn into a thousand pieces of worthless paper. The question is whether or not we should continue to condone an act of international treachery in respect to our own domestic security. The question is whether, in the face of this affront to written engagements with us, America should continue to be the only Republic in this New World, in North and South America, which still maintains full and complete diplomatic hospitality to Moscow. The question is whether we should not emulate our good neighbors, which present a united diplomatic front against the official infiltration of communism.

Now we come to 1939 and 1940. A committee of the House of Representatives to investigate un-American activities in the United States officially reported on January 3, 1940. This is Report No. 1476, of the third session of the Seventy-sixth Congress, House of Representatives, and in the report the committee states:

Hundreds of pages of testimony have established the fact that the Communist Party of the United States can make no more than a superficial claim that it is a political party in the sense in which the American people understand those words. It is, on the contrary, a constituent member of the Communist International and is its agent in the United States. The Communist International in turn is completely dominated by the Communist Party of Soviet Russia.

The committee feels—

The committee being the committee of the House of Representatives—

The committee feels that a careful examination of the facts justifies the assertion that the Communist Party of the United States is a foreign conspiracy masked as a political party.

The committee—

Speaking for the House of Representatives—

The committee is forced to conclude that in practice, the Communist Party is actually functioning as a "border patrol" on American shores for a foreign power—the Soviet Union.

Since the Communist Party of the United States—

Continuing to read the official document and the indictment of the House of Representatives committee itself—

Since the Communist Party of the United States has the avowed purpose of drastically changing the form of government of the United States, it is the opinion of the committee that the party's activities constitute a violation of the Treaty of Recognition entered into between the Government of the United States and the Government of the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in 1933.

Mr. President, I could proceed in great detail, but I have presented enough.

The contract was made in 1933. It was broken in the first instance almost as soon as it was made. It was broken again, directly and specifically, within 2 years to a degree which called for a vigorous and unqualified protest from our own State Department, which in turn was spurned by Moscow. It has since been broken in innumerable instances, as set forth in great detail in this House document from which I have read. There is no contract any longer in existence, and the fruits of the contract should no longer inure to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. International comity and good faith are not one-way streets. The domestic security of the United States is the stake. If it was important enough to defend in the Roosevelt-Litvinov correspondence of 1933, upon which Bolshevik recognition hinged, it is important enough to protect in 1940 in the face of these violated pledges.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. All the things to which the Senator has alluded occurred prior to the appointment and confirmation of Mr. Steinhardt as Ambassador of the United States to Russia. If we are to concede, as I think is true, that the conduct of our diplomatic relations, the recognition of governments, and the appointment of ambassadors, ministers, and other diplomatic representatives is an Executive and not a legislative function, except insofar as the confirmation of ambassadors may be concerned, does not the Senator think the time to have objected to having an ambassador from the United States to Russia was when his name was sent to the Senate by the President for confirmation by the Senate of the United States, and that he should not wait until he is appointed and goes to Russia and then try to take his salary away from him as a representative of the United States?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The only way in which the original recognition of the Soviet Union came before the Senate was on the question of the confirmation of Mr. Bullitt. It was only in that indirect fashion that we could record ourselves.

Mr. BARKLEY. And the Senate confirmed him.

Mr. VANDENBERG. And the Senator from Michigan voted against confirmation in the committee, spoke against it on the floor, voted against it on the floor, and continues to be consistent with that position now.

Mr. BARKLEY. In spite of that, the Senate confirmed Mr. Bullitt.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That has nothing to do with my point of view.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand, but it does have something to do with the Senate's point of view.

If I may further interrupt the Senator——

Mr. VANDENBERG. Just a moment. Let me take the Senator question by question, before he overwhelms me with his cumulative inquiries.

Yes; the Senate confirmed Mr. Bullitt, but if the Senate had known that the contract upon which Mr. Bullitt's appointment was based was a fiction and a fraud, it would not have confirmed him for one single moment, and the Senator from Kentucky would have been one of the first to vote against his confirmation.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senate had all the means of obtaining any information it desired at the time Mr. Bullitt was confirmed.

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senate could not have known what was going to happen under the contract, because that was in the future.

Mr. BARKLEY. Leaving Mr. Bullitt out of it, since he is no longer Ambassador to Russia but Ambassador to France, and since then all these things have happened to which the Senator has referred, there has been a vacancy in the ambassadorship to Russia, and Mr. Steinhardt has been appointed; and on the 17th day of last March, less than a year ago, the United States Senate confirmed Mr. Steinhardt as our Ambassador to Russia, and it had or could have had the same information then which the Senator from Michigan has now, but it did not obtain it, or, if it had it, it did not act upon it, assuming that it was the presidential function to name ambassadors, subject, of course, to confirmation by the Senate. Having agreed to the appointment as Ambassador to Russia of Mr. Bullitt, and having agreed to the appointment as Ambassador to Russia of Mr. Steinhardt, it seems to me it does not now lie in the mouth of the United States Senate to say that, having confirmed Mr. Steinhardt, we will not pay him for his services.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. In just a moment. I think the Senator from Kentucky begs the question. The pending problem is whether or not for the next fiscal year each Member of the United States Senate upon his own individual responsibility is prepared to vote "aye" upon an item of $17,500 to maintain an ambassador at Moscow. I do not care who the Ambassador is, when he was confirmed, how or why he was confirmed. The pending question is whether the Members of the Senate, in the face of this record, are willing to vote for the subsistence and maintenance of an ambassador in Moscow during the next fiscal year. And there is not anything in the President's prerogatives that can relieve me from the responsibility of facing that legislative responsibility. That is the thing I am facing in connection with the statement I made, and that is where I vote "no."

I now yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, is it not true that since last March we have had the Russian alliance with Germany, we have had the Russian invasion of Finland, and we have had the Russian persecution of the unfortunate people in Poland?

Mr. VANDENBERG. All of which is true. But I base my attitude solely upon domestic considerations. The case has finally accumulated to a point where I think no one can read the letter sent to the Foreign Relations Committee by the Secretary of State himself, without finding in it a substantial sympathy with the viewpoint which I now submit to the Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Since that time and during that period we have seen another nation overrun two or three nations; we have seen that other nation persecute men because of their race and religion; we have seen the most brutal outrages perpetrated by one nation which is in alliance with Russia. If we are to compel our Ambassador to Russia to serve without pay, why not do the same with respect to our Ambassador to that other country? And the fact that our President may have recalled our Ambassador to another nation does not make any difference, because he may send him back whenever he sees fit.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the Senator from Kentucky begs the question, Mr. President.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am not begging the question.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Let me comment on what the Senator from Kentucky has said, and then I will yield to the Senator from Arizona. I think the Senator from Kentucky begs the question when he tries to parallel this matter of the Russian recognition with that of any other recognition in the world, because here is the only instance where our designation of an ambassador is based upon a contract and an agreement. There is nothing like it anywhere else in our foreign relationship. Here it is all by itself. That agreement has been violated. What shall we do about it?

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator think the Senate of the United States has any function to perform in the matter of the recognition of the government of any country?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator from Michigan thinks that the Senate is about to vote on an appropriation, and the Senator wants to know why the appropriation is here if he is not a free agent to vote on it as he believes the equities dictate.

Mr. BARKLEY. No; the Senator is begging the question. I asked him whether he thought the Senate of the United States had any function to perform in the recognition of a government.

Mr. VANDENBERG. No; not originally.

Mr. BARKLEY. Then the Senate had no right to object to the recognition of Russia when it was recognized.

Mr. VANDENBERG. It had a right to criticize. The Senate had no prerogative of original interference.

Mr. BARKLEY. Not at all. Neither has it any prerogative of interference in the conduct of those diplomatic relations that are resumed after the recognition of any country.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I disagree with that statement.

Mr. BARKLEY. Well, except in the matter of confirming or rejecting an appointee as an ambassador or a minister. We cannot conduct the foreign affairs of the United States.

Mr. VANDENBERG. No; and I do not want to conduct them, except as they involve a collateral legislative function, as in the present instance.

Mr. BARKLEY. But the Senator is willing to vote and is going to vote to deny to an American ambassador the salary to which he is entitled by reason of the regularity of the sequence of events that resulted in his appointment, because, as the Senator says, Russia has not kept her treaty agreement with the United States or her contractual relationship with the United States. Now, if the Senator is going to deny our ambassadors and our ministers their compensation, because the countries to which they are assigned have not kept all of their agreements with the United States, we will call home most of our diplomatic representatives, and not pay them any salary whatever, because there is scarcely any nation in Europe which can be said to have kept its contracts with the United States.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Has the Senator concluded?

Mr. BARKLEY. For the time being.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should like to comment now on what the Senator has said. No matter what disagreement we may have with other foreign countries, the disagreements are in respect to external matters. This disagreement is in respect to the internal stability and sanctity of the United States, our own Government, and there is no such situation or relationship involved in our contacts with any other government on earth.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator again yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. In just a moment. The Senator from Kentucky preached a sermon to me, and I have to preach one back, and then I will yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Michigan, instead of preaching a sermon back in reply to mine, will be on the mourner's bench and hit the sawdust trail.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I hope at least one or the other of us will pronounce the benediction shortly.

Mr. President, as I was about to say, here is the situation involving the sanctity of contracts in respect to the internal safety and stability of our own Government and our own country. That has no parallel in connection with any other foreign relationship we have.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield right at that point?

Mr. VANDENBERG. No. I will yield in just a moment. The Senator from Kentucky says: "Why, even if they have broken their contract, even if they have spurned us, even if they have treated us with utter contempt in respect to their promises to us, would you take the salary away from a poor ambassador who is over there?"

Well, I certainly think that begs the question. There will not be any ambassador there to pay if there is no pay voted. So we do not need to worry about the ambassador.

The question is whether or not the Senate will vote $17,500 to pay an ambassador to the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics. It does not make any difference how much Senators think the President ought to control foreign relations. It does not make any difference what Senators think the function of the Congress is in this respect. Senators must vote "yes" or "no" on $17,500 this afternoon for an ambassador to Moscow.

That is a legislative function, and it cannot be any other kind of function. Senators cannot avoid that vote by saying, "No; this is the President's job." Senators cannot avoid saying "yes" or "no" on their legislative responsibility with respect to the legislative question as to whether or not $17,500 shall be appropriated for an ambassador to Moscow for the next fiscal year.

I just happen to vote "no" at that point.

I now yield to the Senator from Arizona, and then I think we might vote and go home.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Michigan how taking away $17,500 from the American ambassador to Moscow will in any way compel Russia to keep the treaty that she made with us? How does that cure the situation in any way? How does cutting off the ambassador's salary stop Communist activity in the United States?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I am not talking about stopping the Communist activity in the United States, much as I should like to do so when it advocates the overthrow of our Government by force. It will take a far more severe protest than anything of this nature to stop that activity. The only way it can be done fundamentally is to cure the economic ills of our country so the Communist movement in the United States does not have anything on which to feed.

The thing I am trying to do is so to establish that we have been defrauded in respect to an international contract involved in a pending appropriation and to put our stamp of disapproval upon that action.

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. MINTON. As I understand the Senator, he is trying to answer this legislative question as to whether or not we shall appropriate $17,500. Now, it seems to me that would prompt the first inquiry, Have we an Ambassador? Do we have one in Russia?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Oh, yes.

Mr. MINTON. Should he be paid?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Oh, he will be paid as long as he stays. This appropriation is for the next fiscal year.

Mr. MINTON. Well, for the next fiscal year.

Mr. VANDENBERG. You will not have one if you do not make this appropriation.

Mr. MINTON. Oh, yes; we will. He might stay over there without pay if you cut it off.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Oh, yes.

Mr. MINTON. We have an ambassador. When the Senator says we have an Ambassador and that we ought to pay him he answers the legislative question of whether to appropriate.

Mr. VANDENBERG. No.

Mr. MINTON. Otherwise the Senator will have to go into the question of recognition, which is a matter for the State Department and the Executive.

Mr. BARKLEY. The salary could be withdrawn, but he could still stay there without being paid.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think the matter is still in the hands of the President and that he can still deal with it if he wishes to, but I think we have a right to say that we do not believe there ought to be an ambassador at Moscow under a contract that has been contemptuously and ruthlessly broken. Whatever ultimately happens to the Ambassador or to the Embassy is none of our immediate concern or responsibility. We have at least said for ourselves that we are not willing longer to sit silent under a contemptuous violation of our domestic rights as set forth in the equivalent of a treaty engagement.

Mr. BARKLEY. So it does not resolve itself down simply to a legislative matter as to whether we shall pay our Ambassador, but it resolves itself into a diplomatic matter to determine whether we shall have an ambassador.

Mr. VANDENBERG. So far as the Senate is concerned it is a question of voting for or against an appropritaion.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes. And so far as the Senator from Michigan is concerned, in the back of his head is the thought that there should be a repudiation of our ambassadorship and our diplomatic relationship with Russia.

Mr. VANDENBERG. And so far as the Senator from Michigan is concerned, he votes "No."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, just a moment before the vote is taken. The action of the Appropriations Committee was that such a matter ought not to be taken up before the Appropriations Committee of the Senate, because it was a legislative matter, as the Senator from Michigan has said. We have a Committee on Foreign Relations, of which the Senator happens to be a member, and if any committee of the Senate should take it up it should be taken up by that committee, and a bill reported by it. Certainly it is not the duty of the Appropriations Committee to pass upon this question, and the committee so held.

I hope the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I do not wish to prolong this discussion, because obviously it has already been covered very ably by the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], but I am compelled to say for the record that I was one of the small group of Senators who voted against the confirmation of Mr. Bullitt when he was sent as Ambassador to Russia. One of the reasons why I voted against Ambassador Bullitt's confirmation was that I was convinced, at that time, that Russia would not keep its word with the United States; that it would not live up to its obligations; and that it would not keep its contractual relations; and that that vote against the confirmation of the Ambassador was the only concrete way in which I could register and express my disfavor and disapproval of the recognition of the so-called Russian Government.

Again I have only this means—other than merely talking about it—of expressing and registering my opposition to and disapproval of the continuation of this unhappy and humiliating state of affairs. Certainly my vote originally was not directed against the Ambassador personally; nor is my vote at this time directed against the present Ambassador in any personal sense whatever. I know that we made a great mistake when we recognized Russia. I believe that the people of the United States feel that we made a great mistake. The record shows that a great mistake was made. I will have no part in that mistake. I did not then. I will not now.

For that reason I shall vote to eliminate the appropriation for the Ambassador's salary as being the only concrete way in which I can register my opposition to Soviet Russia and all her ways.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, to begin with, I concede that any Senator has a perfect right to take the position taken by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]. However, I believe he is inconsistent. I do not believe it would be advisable for us as a Nation to withdraw our ambassador from Russia or from any one of several other countries in the world which I think are susceptible to the same argument that can be made against recognition of Russia. As I see it, such action would be an indirect method of taking away the recognition which we have heretofore accorded to Russia. It is a way which Congress sometimes takes, but I think it must be admitted that it is indirect. It is not the proper way to do it.

If a resolution were introduced to withdraw our Ambassador from Russia, or from any other country, and the Foreign Relations Committee should refuse to act on that resolution, as the Senator from Michigan says was done with respect to his resolution, the rules of the Senate provide a way to meet just exactly that kind of a situation. The Senator from Michigan may introduce a resolution any day, and if his resolution prevails, a report may be required from the Committee on Foreign Relations, or he may bring the matter directly before the Senate without any recommendation from the committee. So there is an easy and rather expeditious way to bring the question before the Senate and pass upon it.

On the question of withdrawing our recognition of Russia and several other countries, including Germany, Italy, and Japan, to my mind the countries named are all in the same class, and great argument could be made in favor of doing so, although I believe the better argument is against it in all cases.

In the present terrible condition in which the world finds itself, are we better off or worse off with ambassadors in the capitals of the various nations? Of course, I am not a diplomat. I do not know much about such matters; but it seems to me that during the continuance of the present war in Europe, with the likelihood of its spreading, we should be in better shape with an ambassador in each of those countries than without one. Is it not desirable, through our representatives, to obtain as much information as possible on both sides of the controversy? Are we not better able to obtain it through an ambassador than through any other agency?

To me it seems clear that we ought not at this time to withdraw our recognition of any of these countries, although we do not agree with them in regard to certain fundamental principles of human liberty.

The nations to which I refer are now practicing before the eyes of the world the principle that, without any dispute, without any quarrel, simply because the greater nation wants to swallow up the smaller nation, any nation has a right to destoy any other nation by starvation, by bombs from the air, by murdering women and little children, or by any means.

That is the principle of international law which it seems to me is at stake. Russia is not the only nation which practices such doctrines. I think Russia is guilty of it, but the other nations I have mentioned are likewise guilty. If that is a good reason why we should withdraw recognition of one of those countries, then we ought to withdraw it from all of them, although in my humble opinion we should place ourselves in a disadvantageous position if we should do it. In my opinion, the same reason exists in one case as in the others.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Practically all the nations to which the Senator refers have broken treaties to which they and we are parties.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. They have not only broken treaties to which we are a party, but they have violated a principle of international law, and if such violation is continued, our civilization, or anything like it, will be blotted from the face of the earth. It cannot live with that kind of a principle in vogue.

So, it seems to me that we are confronted with the question whether or not it is better to continue relationships. In view of our desire to stay out of the war, we ought not to do anything unless we can do it without injury to ourselves, and unless it be legal under international law. We ought not to do anything which would put us in a position in which we should be more likely to get into the controversy than we otherwise would be.

Therefore it seems to me that the contention of the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Michigan is not sustained by what I regard as good logic, logic which will control me in my vote, although I very frankly concede that Senators have a perfect right, if they desire, to vote against any appropriation they see fit; and I am not criticising them for it.

Mr. President, another reason which I think we ought to consider is that the recognition or nonrecognition of a foreign government is an Executive function. Foreign governments have been recognized by the Executive authority. Everybody concedes that that matter is within the limits of the rights and prerogatives of the Executive authority. It is true that we may cut off appropriations if we so desire; and if we feel justified, of course, we will do it. However, we have already recognized Russia; and I want Russia recognized. I should not want to withdraw recognition from Russia unless at the same time we should withdraw it from the other nations I have mentioned. Recognition is an Executive function. It has been performed in legal ways, and it is up to us to appropriate the money.

In the past we have destroyed the effectiveness of an office by refusing to appropriate money to maintain it, but that is an indirect way to do it. It seems to me we ought not to do so except in a very desperate case.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. DANAHER. In the performance of his function in this particular, in appointing an ambassador in the first instance, the President performed a constitutional function; did he not?

Mr. NORRIS. As I see it he did.

Mr. DANAHER. I agree. If we have a right to exercise a restraint upon an ambassador, or even to withdraw his salary under the circumstances explained by the proponent of this amendment, we could with equal propriety express our disapproval of decisions of the Supreme Court by withholding an appropriation from it.

Mr. NORRIS. Absolutely. We certainly could.

Mr. DANAHER. And this group as a legislative body fundamentally has no right whatever to impinge upon the honorable status of the constitutional prerogatives of the President in this particular as I see it. Is not that a fair statement in its fundamental aspects?

Mr. NORRIS. I think it is. We have a right to refuse an appropriation for anything we see fit. We may refuse, if we want to do so, to appropriate for any particular specific judge, or any marshal, or any other official for whose salary we ordinarily appropriate money. Sometimes we do it; but when we do it we feel that it is rather a desperate case, and I do not believe we ought to do it in any other case. But we hold the purse strings, and, of course, we have a right to tighten them up in anyway whenever we see fit. I think we should make a mistake to do it in this case if we should refuse to appropriate the money for this ambassadorship.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, though I was opposed to our Government according recognition to the Bolshevik regime, I do not feel disposed to prevent the appropriation to meet the salary of our Ambassador at Moscow. In my opinion we made a mistake in having political dealings with the Soviet Government. Personally I should be glad to see appropriate action taken to sever diplomatic relations with the Stalin regime. Its attack upon Finland and its avowed purpose to destroy democratic governments and to superimpose communism upon the world, warrant action by our Government in recalling our Ambassador and in severing diplomatic relations with Russia.

The Bolshevik regime has disregarded many of its obligations to us as well as to other countries and has sought opportunities to bring governments and peoples under its political control.

I spent some time in Russia and became acquainted with some of the Communist leaders. They frankly confessed that if treaties with other countries were entered into they would avail themselves of every opportunity to spread communism and to undermine what they denominated bourgeoisie governments.

I agree with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] that it is not the function of Congress to accord recognition to a foreign government, but that the authority rests with the President of the United States. Under the circumstances, though I would support a resolution respectfully addressed to the President asking that recognition of the Stalin regime be withdrawn, I am unwilling to vote against the appropriation carried in the provision of the bill under consideration.

Mr. President, on the 25th of last month I briefly addressed the Senate and referred to the Bolshevik Government and to the union of Hitler and Stalin in their efforts to destroy democratic nations. I called attention to the fact that democracy was alien to their philosophy and that their purpose was to overthrow democratic governments and to establish a hateful and oppressive rule upon millions of people not only within the boundaries of their states but in many other countries.

I called attention to the fact that I had not favored the recognition of Russia and that when a representative of the Stalin regime was in Washington attempting to negotiate a treaty with the United States, I believed that certain facts relating to the matter should be brought to the attention of the Executive. I thereupon prepared a memorandum which I submitted to the executive department on the 13th of November 1933. In that memorandum I presented a number of reasons why I believed recognition of the Bolshevik Government should not be accorded by our Government.

I do not desire to take the time of the Senate to traverse the ground covered in the address which I delivered on the 25th of January, but I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks excerpts from the address, together with the memorandum which I submitted to the executive department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The excerpts and memorandum are as follows:

"No circumstances have arisen to date that would alter my attitude, heretofore expressed in the Senate and elsewhere, on the question of recognition by the United States of the Soviet Government of Russia.

"I have always felt the most profound sympathy for the Russian people and have entertained keen regret that they should be subjected to a regime of political and economic dictatorship represented by the present authority in Russia. I have believed that as an American I have no right to interfere with the internal or economic affairs established and maintained by another sovereign nation.

"On the other hand, I have always contended that recognition of a foreign government by our Government is not a duty nor an obligation on our part but an act of policy dictated by considerations which appear to be in our best interest.

"I supported the position of President Wilson in refusing to recognize the Bolshevik regime; and after having visited Russia, where I spent several months and traveled more than 8,000 miles, I was more firmly convinced that the best interests of our country would not be served by extending recognition to the Soviet Government until and unless that Government should change its policy with respect to internal affairs as well as external matters, and, moreover, that it should give ample and convincing proof of its intention to assume in its international relations a clear obligation to act in accordance with the generally recognized standards of friendly intercourse among nations. I am therefore opposed to extending recognition to the Soviet Government until such proof is forthcoming.

"If it should become the policy of our Government to reconsider at this time our official attitude toward the Soviet Government, our first step should be the creation of a competent commission to ascertain, both independently and in consultation with the representatives of the Soviet Government, the necessary facts upon which a judgment can be based as to whether or not the Soviet Government is prepared, in fact, to assume international obligations common to all civilized nations. Specifically, before extending recognition to the Soviet Government, we should know:

"(a) Whether or not that Government is prepared to undertake to conduct no subversive propaganda in our country or our Territorial possessions, either directly through its accredited representatives or indirectly through such an agency as the Third International."

May I interpolate here that I emphasized that point in my memorandum because of conversations which I had with Bolshevik leaders when in Russia, in which they indicated that recognition would afford opportunities for the dissemination of the principles of the communistic faith.

The second point I suggested was:

"Whether or not that Government is prepared to and will dissociate itself from the Third International and will agree to no longer subsidize it or contribute to its maintenance or activities."

May I add in passing that when in Moscow I visited the Third International headquarters. There I saw Mr. Radek, who was, in the absence of Zinoviev, in control of the headquarters. Sitting with him was Bill Haywood, who, as Senators will recall, was prosecuted for transgressions of law during the World War, and convicted. He fled to Russia, forfeiting his bail of $50,000. When I saw him in the Third International Headquarters he greeted me and stated that the United States "didn't get" him. He was frank in indicating that, as a member of the Third International, he was using his best efforts to spread communism in the United States and in other countries. I might add in passing that he remained in Russia until the time of his death, which was several years later.

I might add, for the benefit of my colleagues from the South, that sitting with Mr. Radek was also a colored man from Alabama, who frankly stated that he was a Communist and was a member of the Third International, and was engaged in the spread of communism among his race in the United States.

The memorandum continues:

"(c) Whether or not that Government is prepared to and will guarantee an open public and fair trial to any American citizen who may be charged with the violation of any law, rule, or regulation of such Government;

"(d) Whether or not that Government is prepared to and will recognize former subjects of Russia who are naturalized American citizens as American citizens and will accord to them all the rights of American citizens;

"(e) Whether or not that Government is prepared, with respect to the war loans extended by our Treasury to fully accredited representatives of the Russian Government then in power, to place itself on the same footing as all the other governments which had borrowed from us during the war—that is, to acknowledge the obligation and to enter into proper negotiations for the discharging of such obligation;

"(f) Whether or not that Government is prepared to enter into negotiations for the satisfaction of the claims of our citizens who had suffered property damage because of acts initiated and carried out by authority of that Government.

"The willingness of the Soviet Government to assume the undertakings herein enumerated should be embodied in formal declaration precedent to our act of recognition. The experience of other important nations, notably Great Britain and France, which had recognized the Soviet Government unconditionally, should serve as sufficient warning to us as to the difficulty of protecting and maintaining our national interests in the face of the international policies pursued by the Soviet Government in the absence of previous clearly defined undertakings on the part of that Government.

"It is often asserted that recognition of the Soviet Government would result for our country in a large expansion of our export trade to Russia. This, it is held, would be of sufficient benefit to several important branches of agricultural and industrial production in the United States to render the act of recognition a step in the direction of promoting our best national interests.

"The truth of this assertion should be another necessary field of inquiry for the American commission suggested above. From my personal investigation of this subject, I am convinced that no foundation whatever exists for the extravagant claims advanced in favor of outstanding trade benefits that would accrue to us as a result of our extending recognition to the Soviet Government. The possibility of our purchases from Russia, the proceeds of which could be used to pay for our exports to that country, is admittedly very limited. Our sales to Russia, over and above our purchases from her, would have to be governed by one of the following factors:

"(1) A net balance in favor of Russia in her trade with her principal customers; that is, Germany, Great Britain, Italy, and France;

"(2) Exports of gold by her; and

"(3) New credits extended to her in this country.

"I am credibly informed that for some time ahead any visible net balance in favor of Russia in her trade with the principal European nations is bound to be absorbed by her payments to these countries on account of credits already extended to her by their citizens. Similarly, her stocks and current production of gold are relatively small. Hence, there would appear to be but a slight businesslike basis for the extension to her of any substantial volume of new credits.

"All these questions will have to be thoroughly and authoritatively investigated before adequate judgment can be formed as to whether or not the recognition of the Soviet Government would, in fact, be in our best economic interest. Surely, no officials of our Government would be so oblivious of the disastrous consequences of our huge loans to foreign countries during the post-war years as to lay the foundation for a resumption of substantial loans abroad without a most careful investigation as to the soundness of such investments. In short, an unconditional recognition of the Soviet Government, prior to an adequate and authoritative investigation, and unaccompanied by a definite assumption by the Soviet Government of trustworthy undertakings along the lines here suggested, would be a rash and precipitate action, likely to be profoundly deplored all too soon after it is taken."

Mr. President, though not a prophet, time has vindicated the position which I took.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. LODGE. I ask for a division.

On a division, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], in charge of the bill, a question or two about the Federal Bureau of Investigation, beginning on page 54. There is no amendment by the committee to any part of that item. Can the Senator tell me how much in the aggregate is included in the bill for that particular Bureau? How much do these various items total?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will tell the Senator in a moment. My recollection is that the amount is $7,000,000. I shall have to find the place.

Mr. McNARY. It is on page 56, line 1.

Mr. McKELLAR. The amount is $7,222,000.

Mr. NORRIS. I am wondering if, for instance, the items at the bottom of page 56, commencing with line 18, and all of page 57, where various items are included, are part of the $7,222,000?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; they are not. They are emergency items. The amount is $7,222,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Then the other items must be added to that amount to make the total.

Mr. McKELLAR. They are emergency items pure and simple, and are added to it, of course.

Mr. NORRIS. How much do they amount to?

Mr. McKELLAR. They amount to $2,488,000.

Mr. NORRIS. So the total amount for the Bureau of Investigation would be a little more than $9,500,000?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes, sir. That Bureau has increased right and left, from a very small beginning to a very large Bureau.

Mr. NORRIS. Did the committee take any evidence on the activities of the Bureau?

Mr. McKELLAR. No. The committee, as is usual with all appropriations, invited the head of the Department of Justice, as it did the heads of the other departments, to appear if there were any objections to what the House had done. There was nothing about the Bureau of Investigation, and no evidence was brought before the committee in reference to it. The Senator will recall that a few years ago I undertook to cut down the appropriation for the Bureau of Investigation, and it was added to instead of being cut down.

Mr. NORRIS. Frankly, I am worried about the activities of this Bureau. I must confess, to begin with, that I have no concrete evidence which I could offer in court to sustain the position which I take. Yet it seems to me this is a subject which should be looked into. We are appropriating in this bill a little more than $9,500,000 for this Bureau, and under the law creating the Bureau, and in connection with its activities, it does not seem to me it can utilize that amount of money. My information to a great extent depends upon items of news which have appeared at various times in the newspapers and magazines. In one article in particular, appearing in the New Republic, this Bureau is very severely criticized. I do not know whether it is in this article or not, but in many of the newspapers I have read statements to the effect that the methods resorted to by the representatives of the Bureau are, to say the least, rather abhorrent to one who believes in constitutional liberty, and the rights we think we all have as citizens of the United States under the Constitution.

It is alleged, and it was circulated in the newspapers at the time, as I remember, that a large number of people, to give an illustration, were arrested in the nighttime in Detroit. Several raids were made, if they may be denominated raids, in different cities of the United States, where similar arrests took place. As I understand from the newspapers, those arrested were charged with having engaged in what was admittedly illegal, perhaps, under the statute, that is, enlisting as soldiers in the Loyalist Army of Spain during the unfortunate revolution which took place in Spain. That, I understand, is a technical crime under the laws of the United States, a statutory crime, but it does not imply any malice, anything that is mean, such as would be charged against a bank robber, or a kidnapper, or a man who had persistently violated the Mann Act, or something similar, showing an evil intent. It was a statutory offense. As I understand, men and women were arrested at 4 o'clock in the morning and taken out of their homes without any notice that they were to be arrested. They were handcuffed, and in that condition were taken to the common jail, and some were held in custody in other places, where the handcuffed men were charged with a statutory offense, which had attached to it no ignominy, because we must all admit that our people were very much divided on the question whether we should assist the Loyalist cause in Spain. There was no malice.

If this charge be true, it seems to me this bureau is engaging in an activity not in consonance with our idea of constitutional right, an activity which cannot be excused. If these charges are only partially true, it is a matter of taking the law into their own hands and punishing people who are not convicted of a crime, who are not charged with any malicious crime, who are not charged with anything which has attached to it any element of criminality.

I ask unanimous consent to have included as a part of my remarks the editorial on this subject in the New Republic of February 19, 1940, to which I have referred.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New Republic of February 19, 1940]

AMERICAN OGPU

When the Russian Ogpu and German Gestapo commit their raids, we shudder that any government should make such indecencies technically lawful. In our country, Congress and the Supreme Court forbid "dirty business" by law-enforcement officers. No Federal detective, we assume, can take a man's papers from him without lawful warrant. No G-man, we assume, will descend suddenly on citizens, to rush them on a moment's surprise notice before a grand jury, with their books or records. Nor, we assume, would a Federal agent get a man or woman into his office for a star-chamber examination, under the pretext of a subpena requiring him to appear before a grand jury.

Nevertheless, these things were done by our own Federal Bureau of Investigation to the Veterans of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade between February 6 and 10, 1940, in the civilized city of New York. At the same time the F. B. I. launched raids against this organization in Detroit and Milwaukee—raids condemned by the Civil Liberties Union as "high-handed," by Representative COFFEE of Washington, who said they "smell bad," by the Michigan Conference for Civil Rights, by the conservative Milwaukee Journal, and by many others. The Journal said in an editorial that the F. B. I. gave the impression "of a Gestapo that can haul citizens off to prison and court in ignominy, imposing any kind of conditions the captors wish without accountability." The Journal added that chaining the captives made them look like "a chain gang being led away. * * * Why arrest a man at 4 a. m. who can be found any time during the day? And why handcuff him when his record or the offense charged * * * contains no intimation of a violent element? Is it that Chief Hoover and his men want to create a wartime hysteria in this country?"

Three weeks before these raids, agents of this most powerful secret-service bureau virtually admitted to the New York Times that they regarded their arrest of the young Christian Fronters on the charge of conspiring to overthrow the Government "as a formality" (the quotation is from the Times' paraphrase) "that enabled the Government to hold the men" for other purposes—a well-known device not wholly alien to the device of protective custody.

A week before that, the Bureau's request for a special appropriation of $2,500,000 to combat subversive activities by means of its spy and detective service was discussed by Representative MARCANTONIO. He called to the attention of his colleagues testimony given in support of the request by the Bureau's chief, J. Edgar Hoover. MARCANTONIO warned the House that Hoover's activities "constitute a real, serious menace to civil liberties." They "lay the foundation," he said, "for Palmer raids, for a Palmer system and for a Gestapo system in the United States." There is every reason to keep track of genuine foreign spies and saboteurs, but this can be done better if it is not confused with spectacular assaults on the rights of citizens.

Last September Hoover's Nation-wide protection of the country against subversive elements was well under way. He asked everybody, especially banks, business houses, railroads, and local authorities, to help rid "America of those who desire to undermine the Federal Government." But he appears to suspect that some of the undermining is planned at meetings for which the local authorities themselves grant permits. He disseminated a suggestion received from one mayor that local authorities notify Hoover's bureau of every permit issued anywhere in this country for any public assemblage, "before the meeting starts." In other words, he is engaged in an effort to bring under the eye of his centralized detective service meetings in the parks and city streets anywhere and everywhere in America.

Hoover's talent for finding radicals illustrates what Representative COFFEE said to the Michigan civil-rights conference about the current hysteria. "We're going simply crazy on this subject of 'reds' in the United States. We see 'reds' everywhere, under every bed and table." Hoover himself found a Communist issue in the attempt of the Federal Civil Service Commission to require him to select from civil-service lists the additional agents he will hire in his attack on subversive activities. He charged that the Commission had previously tried to send him Communists, to work in the very midst of his detectives.

Now, while Hoover is getting additional millions from Congress, the protests against his type of law enforcement are piling up. His actions in Detroit will probably be investigated by Attorney General Jackson. The head of the latter's criminal division, John Rogge, in a straightforward speech to the Michigan conference, said that the whole incident is being studied. Statesmanlike action in this affair will enable the Government not only to undo the lawlessness that has been practiced but also to offset the fast-growing suspicion that the administration has deliberately embarked on an "anti-red" campaign. Valuable as is the inquiry into this chain-gang incident, it should not mark the limit of the new Attorney General's investigation. He should study the whole record of the lawlessness of Hoover's bureau, and also the widespread salesmanship by which Hoover has made himself much too powerful to be easily curbed by a superior.

In foreign countries people are forced by their governments to submit to their gestapos. In this country Hoover has the voluntary support of all who delight in gangster movies and 10-cent detective magazines. Already, in the minds of many Americans, the great Department of Justice is merely its G-men. At every entrance of the massive building in which it is housed, the only placard for the visitor to read is one which directs him to the gory dime museum organized by Hoover at public expense. Hoover has been made known to young and old by radio, by newsreels, by motion pictures based on the propaganda he furnishes to script writers, by speeches, and by the widespread franking of those speeches.

But the glamor that surrounds him also conceals the growth of a power inconsistent with our conception of democratic institutions. That power is exercised through the forty-odd branches the Government maintains for his Bureau throughout the country. Without interference from civil service, he picks and rules his detectives with an iron hand. Through his branch chiefs, he maintains close contact with Federal judges and with Federal prosecuting attorneys everywhere. And on almost any Federal official, as well as any "red," Hoover can have a dossier at Government expense.

Last spring he had to come to Congress for a quarter of a million dollars he had overspent, as reported in the New York Times, "without authorization of law." Representative WOODRUM of Virginia opposed Hoover's request for an appropriation of twice the amount of his overdraft on Uncle Sam. WOODRUM said that he did not wish to "detract from the fine service" rendered by the F. B. I. in kidnaping cases, "although I do not hang any halo about its head. * * * It has to abide by the law, and it ought to be the first one to live within the law." The Times reported that the application for double the amount unlawfully spent "was shouted down." But the House legalized the amount to which Hoover on his own authority had already decided to commit Congress.

Attorney General Jackson might well take to heart what was done toward combating wartime hysteria by some of his predecessors, whom he equals in courage and experience. One of the greatest of the Attorneys General, Harlan Stone, now on the Supreme Court, reduced the Bureau to its normal size, after it had become swollen under William J. Burns, as it is now swollen under J. Edgar Hoover. When Herbert Hoover became President, he created a commission whose greatest achievement was a thorough study of the lawlessness of law-enforcement officials. J. Edgar Hoover was then operating a small bureau, no more important than the modest, small, efficient secret services in the Departments of the Treasury and the Post Office. In those days the F. B. I. was not an American Ogpu. Its law-enforcement activities could be kept within the limits of law observance.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it seems to me this matter should be inquired into, and I was wondering whether the committee had any information as to the activities of this Bureau, and whether it has been given any information as to the other things which have been charged against it.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; the committee does not have such information.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not alleging these matters as facts of which I have personal knowledge, for I have not. I rely for my information upon the general news of the day, and particularly upon the editorial in the New Republic magazine, for which I think we all have the profoundest respect, and which ordinarily is not guilty of making any assertions or charges without due and proper investigation.

Mr. McKELLAR. In connection with what the Senator from Nebraska has stated, in order that the Senator and others interested may have the information, I may state that the appropriations for this Bureau began in 1930 with a regular appropriation of $2,307,720, and there was a deficiency of $350,000 added. The appropriation has gradually increased until the regular appropriation for this year is $7,244,000. I ask unanimous consent that the figures showing the increases from 1930 to 1941 be inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. If I am wrong I desire to be corrected, but I had understood that this bill carried an appropriation of about $9,500,000 for this Bureau. The Senator has not included what he calls the emergency appropriation.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is true; and, in order that the whole picture may be in the RECORD, I ask unanimous consent that I may insert the table on page 113 of the hearings in the House committee on the Justice Department appropriation bill, which will include the figures of the emergency fund, the total allowed by the Budget being $9,932,000.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, I should like to direct a question to the Senator from Tennessee, and therefore I call his attention to page 51, line 5, and the succeeding lines down to line 9. For convenience I will read. On page 51 it purports to award an appropriation to the Patent Office—

For investigating the question of public use or sale of inventions for 2 years or more prior to filing applications for patents, and such other questions arising in connection with applications for patents and the prior art as may be deemed necessary by the Commissioner of Patents.

Is it customary, I ask, for an authorization for an investigation of that character to be included in a general appropriation bill?

Mr. McKELLAR. It is. It has been done for some time.

Mr. DANAHER. Will the Senator tell us what is the nature of the proposed investigation?

Mr. McKELLAR. The amount is stated as $68,000.

Mr. DANAHER. That is correct.

Mr. McKELLAR. Out of that, provision is made for a great many things. If the Senator will begin on line 25, page 50, "Miscellaneous expenses," he will find that the provision is:

For purchase and exchange of law, professional, and other reference books and publications and scientific books; expenses of transporting publications of patents issued by the Patent Office to foreign governments; directories, furniture, filing cases; exchange of labor-saving office devices; for investigating the question of public use or sale of inventions for 2 years or more prior to filing applications for patents, and such other questions arising in connection with applications for patents and the prior art as may be deemed necessary by the Commissioner of Patents.

So the Senator will see that that is just one of a number of items for which the entire amount is appropriated.

Mr. DANAHER. I thank the Senator; and he has accurately read the entire subdivision, I agree. But what is the investigation referred to in line 5, page 51, "for investigating the question of public use or sale of inventions?" What does that mean?

Mr. McKELLAR. That language has been in similar bills, I am advised, for a number of years. The Patent Office is now to investigate the question of public use or sale of inventions for 2 years or more prior to the filing of applications for patents.

Mr. DANAHER. Does not the Senator remember that last year we cut down the number of years of the waiting period from 2 to 1. Then why should we continue this investigation, if the Senator is correct in saying that this is a continuing investigation?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not recall that we cut it down from 2 years to 1 year. Has the Senator located that language in the act?

Mr. DANAHER. I will say that I have examined the Senate hearings, and I do not find a word about that in the Senate hearings.

Mr. McKELLAR. No, there is not a word about it in the Senate hearings, and there is nothing about it in the House hearings this year, because provision was made for cutting the period of waiting from 2 years to 1 year. This is an item that is a continuous appropriation, and this language has been used year after year.

Mr. DANAHER. The Senator does not know how much of the $68,000 would go for the investigation?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I do not.

Mr. DANAHER. But the Senator is satisfied that it is an appropriation which for this year, anyway, ought to be continued?

Mr. McKELLAR. I cannot say that I am satisfied about it because the Senate committee did not investigate that particular item.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. DANAHER. I gladly yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to know from the Senator from Connecticut or the Senator from Tennessee what authority, if any, there is in the law in regard to prohibiting or allowing the sale of a patent or invention prior to the filing of an application for a patent. Is that permitted? I am asking for information. Is there a law, for instance, which prohibits the sale of an invention prior to the application for a patent?

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, no one would have a right to infringe upon an existing patent by the manufacture and sale of something which would constitute an infringement. But whenever anyone invents a new device which is not an infringement upon any patent right already existing he may sell that invention or use it. Of course he is not given a monopoly through a patent if he does not patent it, but he may sell it so long as it does not infringe upon other patents.

Mr. NORRIS. If he did not apply for a patent it would be open to anyone to make use of it.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think the item is simply to investigate the extent to which inventions are used.

Mr. NORRIS. The question which arises in my mind is: Suppose I have a new invention and sell it before I apply for a patent, and then I apply for a patent.

Mr. BARKLEY. The fact that you may have used it or distributed it, so long as it does not violate any existing patent, would not preclude you from applying for a patent at any time you saw fit to do so.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I will call attention to page 9 of the House hearings, in which we find this language:

> An inventor had the privilege, under the old law, of publicly using an invention for 2 full years before he was required to file a patent application. If he filed his application within the 2-year period, his public use of the invention did not bar him from receiving a patent.

Last year we passed a bill which would reduce or shorten the public use from 2 years to 1 year. We did that for the purpose of expediting the termination of the life of the whole patent, so that no monopoly could be continued too long, and at the same time we passed legislation to try to expedite the handling of applications in the Patent Office.

But now to come back to what the Senator from Tennessee said. My questions were directed to the objectives sought to be achieved by year after year providing for the continuation of an investigation, the results of which we have already acted upon, as a consequence of which we passed additional legislation. How long are we to continue this sort of investigation for "2 or more years," as the language says? It was with those thoughts in mind that I directed my question to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I thank the Senator for doing so. I am not a member of the Patents Committee, but I recall the law to which the Senator refers.

Mr. DANAHER. Mr. President, to bring the matter to a head—and we all want to have a vote taken on the bill—in the item for miscellaneous expenses of the Patent Office on page 51, line 5, after the word "devices" and the semicolon, I move to strike out:

> For investigating the question of public use or sale of inventions for 2 years or more prior to filing applications for patents, and such other questions arising in connection with applications for patents and the prior art as may be deemed necessary by the Commissioner of Patents; for expense attending defense of suits instituted against the Commissioner of Patents.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have no objection to that language being stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. DANAHER] on page 51, beginning in line 5.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 52, line 11, it is proposed to strike out "$639,500" and to insert "$650,600; including $46,460 for the Division of Personnel Supervision and Management."

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, the amount of money actually involved is $11,100. It relates to the rejection by the Senate Committee on Appropriations of an amount sufficient to pay the Director and the Assistant Director of the Division of Personnel, in the Department of Justice.

I understand the action was taken in the House subcommittee originally as in the nature of a punishment of the Director and the Assistant Director because they continued to hold their positions after the Appropriations Committee subcommittee on the State, Commerce, and Justice Departments appropriation bill had advised that no appropriation would be made for the purpose. I think it was a very unfair action. Attorney General Jackson, the present Attorney General, as well as Attorney General Murphy, indicated very strongly that the Department of Justice needed these two officials.

The effect of the action of the Senate committee and of the House committee is to have a division upon which the sum of $39,000 will be spent without an executive head.

It happens that Mr. Brownrigg is from the State of Michigan. It happens that he resigned a $7,500 position to come to Washington and take this job at a reduction in salary of $1,000 at the request of the former Attorney General. The effect of the action of the Senate subcommitee will be to provide no funds to pay either the Director or the Assistant Director. It seems to me we ought to strike out the entire appropriation of some $51,000, or else have a director.

I should like to ask the chairman of the subcommittee why that action was taken.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the reason was that the Department made application for the establishment of the two offices last year and the House refused to establish them, as did the Senate. That was early in the year. The Department had time to come before the committee last spring and did not do so. It waited until after Congress adjourned, and then established the offices anyway, and undertook so to arrange the appropriation as to pay the salaries of the new offices out of what are called lapses, or vacancies caused by employees of the Department being separated from the service by death, resignation, or otherwise, although in the natural order of things others would be appointed to take the places of those thus separated from the service. Notwithstanding the fact that the House specifically turned down the Department, it went ahead and established these two offices and paid for them out of the lapses that occurred during the year.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. REYNOLDS. What right did the Department have to pay them, in view of the fact that previously the House had absolutely refused to appropriate for them?

Mr. McKELLAR. The House regarded it as an act of bad faith, and on that account refused to make the appropriation of $11,100.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to answer the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. BROWN. The subcommittee of the House Committee on Deficiency Appropriations had this matter before it. An appeal was made to the subcommittee to take care of the situation. It was the first committee to which the Department of Justice could apply. This action took place as explained by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] in examining Mr. Brownrigg:

Senator BYRNES. I notice you did tell the Congressman who was interested in this matter that [quoting]:

"It might clarify the matter if I said that this position was established prior to the meeting of the deficiency committee, and while that committee did not appropriate or recommend an appropriation of money to cover the position—"

Because they had surplus funds on hand sufficient to cover it—

"they, nevertheless, very heartily sanctioned the personnel program that was presented. They indicated that they were heartily in accord with the program, provided the money to finance it could be obtained out of present appropriations."

And it was in the current appropriation in the form of something like $9,000 of excess money and surplus funds.

They said that, in view of the great need for economy, this program should be financed out of existing appropriations.

The situation was that the Department applied to the first committee which had jurisdiction of the situation, which was the deficiency subcommittee. That committee approved what the Department had done, and told the officials to go ahead. These men were caught in the conflict of jurisdiction between the deficiency subcommitee and the subcommittee on the Department of Justice of the Committee on Appropriations of the House; and because they did not go to the subcommittee on the Department of Justice, it now appears that these gentlemen are to be eased out of their jobs, and that we are to have a division without a head.

Mr. McKELLAR. Not without a head, because the Department has a personnel officer. It had one before, and it has had one all the time. It was trying to establish a different arrangement, a new personnel division.

Let me read the testimony of Mr. Brownrigg, who testified about it:

Senator McKELLAR. This committee had a hearing on the Department of Justice bill in May. Why was it that you did not come before this committee to see about these positions?

Mr. BROWNRIGG. They were not presented with the regular budget because the Director of the Budget decided to present the matter of the money for all of these personnel programs in the various departments to Congress in a separate appropriation item, and submit it to the deficiency appropriation committee, which was done.

Senator McKELLAR. And they were all turned down, were they not?

Mr. BROWNRIGG. Yes, sir; with the language that Congress approved the program, but that the program should be financed out of moneys already appropriated.

Mr. BROWN. Which they had.

Mr. McKELLAR. I continue to read:

Senator McKELLAR. You had an opportunity to come before this committee at that time. Why did you not do it, instead of overruling the committee? The committee turned you down. You overruled the committee.

Mr. BROWNRIGG. Senator, I am just a civil-service employee, and had nothing to do with what appeals should be made or how the fiscal affairs should be conducted.

Senator McKELLAR. Who established the position?

Mr. BROWNRIGG. The position was established by the Attorney General through regular civil-service procedure. The positions were created, and classification sheets were prepared and submitted to the Civil Service Commission in the regular way and approved by the Commission.

These gentlemen went through the process of going to the Appropriations Committee of the House and asking for appropriations for this very purpose. The House committee turned them down; and, simply overruling the House committee, disregarding the House committee, they went right ahead, just as though the House committee had told them to go ahead, and created the offices anyway.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They were merely trying to make two blades of grass grow where one grew before. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, the Senator refers to the committee. It was a subcommittee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. BROWN. One subcommittee had approved the idea.

Mr. McKELLAR. This is what the full committee had to say about it: I now read from the report of the House committee:

Administrative Division: The work of the Administrative Division shows a continuing growth and it appears that increases in appropriations made to other divisions of the Department have been proportionately much greater during the past several years than the additional sums granted this unit to bear its proportionate share of the increased departmental activities. In the bill for 1940 the committee approved several increases in personnel throughout this Bureau on the basis of testimony presented the committee indicating that a genuine need existed for the positions requested. It appears, however, that instead of filling positions, the justification for which had been established to the satisfaction of the committee, the Department set up two new positions—one at $6,500 and one $4,600—without securing previous congressional approval for such use of the funds. Appropriations made in good faith for particular purposes must be used in good faith for such purposes and the tables of expenditures and estimates in the Budget must present a true picture with respect to each position authorized. The committee are eliminating the $11,100 from the appropriation which represents the sum used for the purpose of filling these two positions.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not the floor.

Mr. BROWN. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator permit me to ask a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. Is it not true, moreover, that the committee have adopted this year the policy of not making any increases for purposes of personnel management?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is entirely new. We have not done it in other departments.

Mr. LODGE. Although other departments have made such requests.

Mr. McKELLAR. They have made such requests. It has not been done; and we are treating this Department in the same way as the others.

Mr. BROWN. As a matter of fact, the entire appropriation will be less than it was last year.

Mr. McKELLAR. That may be true; but that is not the question involved. I think the departmental employees and officers ought to be fair and frank with the Congress. When they come and ask for appropriations for a certain purpose, they ought not to take the appropriations they obtain and use them for an entirely different purpose with which the Congress is not made acquainted. For that reason our committee agreed with the House committee, and the item was left out.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I have been reliably informed by the gentleman who was acting chairman of the House subcommittee that there is considerable feeling in that committee that a mistake was made because of the fact to which I have alluded—the fact that the Subcommittee on Deficiency Appropriations had told these officials to go ahead in the manner in which they did go ahead. In view of that statement, is not the Senator willing to take the matter to conference and see if it can be worked out to the satisfaction of the entire conference committee, rather than doing what seems to me to be an injustice to these two men, who are the victims of their superiors? Certainly they are the victims of the President and the Attorney General, because the President and the Attorney General told them to go ahead and take these positions, which they did.

I ask the Senator if he will not take the amendment to conference under those circumstances.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I should be glad to do so if this were an ordinary case in which something had been left out and had not come before the committee, especially on the request of the Senator from Michigan, for whom I have the highest admiration and esteem and personal regard and fondness.

Mr. BROWN. I know now the Senator is going to turn me down. [Laughter.]

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish I could do it; but the committee has voted on the matter, and I feel that it would put me in an improper position before my own committee to yield to the blandishments of my friend from Michigan.

Mr. BROWN. If the Senator would call me some appropriate names that were not complimentary and agree to my amendment, I would feel better about the matter than I now do. [Laughter.]

Mr. McKELLAR. I could not do that.

Mr. BROWN. But I sincerely believe that a great injustice is being done to two men who absolutely are not responsible for this condition.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think there is something in the Senator's contention, at that.

Mr. BROWN. Under those circumstances, I think the matter ought to go to conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate and open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment to be proposed, the question is on the engrossment of the amendments and the third reading of the bill.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill (H. R. 8319) was read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 26, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O blessed Saviour of love, sympathy, and patience, we come to Thee for the forgiveness of sins and for the bread of life that Thou mayest be all in all to us. As daily life rushes on, enable us to know ourselves to be true. Let selfishness be transformed until it embraces our friends, our community, our country, and our world. Heavenly Father, sanctify all bereavement, and grant that some leaves from the tree of life may fall and be caught for the healing of sorrow. We pray that Thy abundant blessings may be upon all Thy ministers of every name. Clothe them with power that they may make known the counsel of God for the welfare of men. Oh, unite Thy people by the affinities of the Christ love that charity and godliness may go forth throughout our land, crowning it with the glory of the Lord. We invoke Thy divine care to abide with our Speaker and the Congress. In our Redeemer's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, February 23, 1940, was read and approved.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL, 1940

PROBLEM OF UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, on Thursday last every Member of the House received a letter signed by 24 of his colleagues inviting him to come to a meeting this evening at 7:30 o'clock in the World War Veterans' Committee room, No. 356, in the old House Office Building, for a discussion of the unemployment problem. I rise at this time simply to remind the Members of that meeting and to assure them that it has no preconceived purpose; that the meeting is to be precisely what the letter said, an attempt to enable us through an interchange of views to sharpen our viewpoint toward the central problem of this century and to focus our attention upon it more directly, with the aim of thinking through to a broad general and effective approach to a solution thereof.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

BALANCING THE BUDGET

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute and to extend my remarks in the RECORD by placing therein a brief statement which I made in 1937.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, the Appropriations Committee of the House of Representatives is to be congratulated upon the jealous care with which it has been scrutinizing all appropriations during the present session of the Congress. Substantial reductions have been made even below the Budget estimates for the next fiscal year. If this policy is persisted in and the House continues to support our Appropriations Committee until final adjournment of the present Congress, it is not unlikely we shall have made a good start toward approximating, at least, an essential but long-deferred balance between Federal expenditures and Federal income. Let the good work go on.

I have been taking the medicine I am prescribing. I have voted against billions of dollars of appropriations for worthy purposes which, nevertheless, I have been convinced, elementary financial prudence demanded we should either do without or at least postpone. I have voted against appropriations for excellent projects and worthy purposes which would have been of advantage to Colorado and to Denver. I have done this despite some protests from home. But I believe such action has the approval of those in Denver who realize that the evil day inevitably cometh, soon or late, to the Nation, as to the individual, that pursues indefinitely the policy of spending more than is received.

That I am no recent convert to the policy of prudent economy in Federal expenditures, appears from a statement made by me in this House during consideration of an appropriation bill on May 20, 1937. (See vol. 81, pt. 5, pp. 4861–62 of permanent bound edition of CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.)

Such warnings needed then, 2 years and 9 months ago, are imperative now.

My former statement is as follows:

Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I have no particular objection to the paragraph which has just been read; but, as a very ardent Democrat and as a supporter of the administration, I wish to express a very solemn warning.

Within the last 4 years I personally have voted against billions of dollars of appropriations for worthy purposes, which, however, we could not afford. In addition thereto, I have voted against more billions of dollars of authorizations for appropriations for excellent purposes, which should be deferred. With all the earnestness of my soul, I say we are in a position comparable to that of one drifting in a boat down the river above Niagara Falls. If we value our safety, we had better pull to the shore. Day by day, if we but listen, we can hear more and more clearly the roar of those falls—the falls of national insolvency and then of inflation, with its attendant misery and suffering, which bear hardest upon the poor and those of moderate means. The President has given us warning again and again. He has suggested. He has warned. He has entreated. The leaders of this House have done the same. As you love our country and its people, my colleagues, remember we are not spending our own money. No. We are spending the money of the people of the United States. From every district in this Nation have come protests against extravagance. Repeatedly I have written in answer to earnest and persuasive pleas from special pressure groups for appropriations for excellent but costly schemes. "We cannot do it at this time. We cannot afford it."

I entreat you when we come to vote seperately in the House on some of the amendments that have been adopted in Committee of the Whole to be reasonable. Think of the fact that we are not spending our own money. We are spending the people's money.

Please remember another thing. The receipts by the Treasury are hundreds of millions of dollars below the estimates from the revenue act which was passed last year. Furthermore, we have exceeded in this and some other appropriation bills the figures approved by the Budget. The Budget figures were based on estimates of much larger returns from the tax bill passed last year than we now know we can hope to receive. In short, we now know that our income will be less than we had expected and our expenditures are greater than we had planned. And daily we are borrowing more money to run the Government.

I entreat you, as one who has in his own part of the country many worthy projects which I should like to have the Government undertake if we could afford it, for Heaven's sake be reasonable.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mrs. O'DAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a short editorial from the Christian Advocate.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

DEPORTATION OF HARRY BRIDGES

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LELAND M. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I have a letter from the San Francisco Industrial Union Council, affiliated with the C. I. O., criticizing me for the introduction of my bill to deport Mr. Harry Bridges. I am going to insert this in the RECORD and I am going to insert my answer thereto. I will ask the privilege of doing that.

It is a terrible indictment of the American Government, particularly the Secretary of Labor, that this undesirable alien, Harry Bridges, has not already been deported. It begins to appear that they think more of undesirable aliens in this country than they do honest, decent laboring people. I hope that everyone in the House will read the criticism that the C. I. O. has given me and my answer thereto.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert those letters in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letters referred to are as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., February 21, 1940.

MR. HERMAN STUYVELAAR,
Secretary-Treasurer, San Francisco District Industrial Union Council, 593 Market Street, San Francisco, Calif.

MY DEAR SIR: This will acknowledge receipt of your letter of February 16, 1940, addressed jointly to myself, Congressmen FRANCK HAVENNER, and RICHARD J. WELCH.

Since when have you become the judge of all that is right and rightful, or the judge of what may be in other people's minds? I ask this after reading the second and third paragraphs of your joint letter. In my opinion, you are just about as honest and sincere when you write this letter as you are when you mislead labor in this country.

My bill is aimed at those who are against America and Americanism, who preach a doctrine of destruction of the American form of government. Naturally, if you uphold Communists and those who preach destruction of the American form of government, you would not agree with my bill.

If you were really sincere, you would welcome a bill that would purge all labor of these Communists. I do say to you that if socialism, fascism, nazi-ism, or communism ever prevailed in this country, every single labor union would be wiped out, and I defy you to show me any labor union in Italy, Germany, or Russia.

I am going to ask you the question whether you, yourself, are a citizen of the United States.

Another thing you won't agree with me on is this. I don't believe any foreigner, who is not a citizen of the United States, has any right to represent American citizens in collective bargaining.

I have many enemies among the Communists and groups who preach destruction of the United States, and I want to say to you that I have always stated that a man can attain a certain high standing by reason of the quality of his enemies, and I thank God every night for every damn one of them.

Yours truly,

_____.

P. S.: With reference to the fourth paragraph of your letter, wherein you say that Mr. Bridges was completely exonerated by the trial examiner, Dean James M. Landis, in my opinion he might have been whitewashed, but he never was exonerated.

SAN FRANCISCO DISTRICT INDUSTRIAL UNION COUNCIL,
San Francisco, Calif., February 16, 1940.

Congressman LELAND FORD,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.
Congressman FRANCK R. HAVENNER,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.
Congressman RICHARD J. WELCH,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: We understand that Congressman LELAND FORD has introduced into Congress a bill calling for the deportation of aliens who "sympathize with or use the support of Communists," etc.

We hope and trust you are not being misled by Mr. FORD as to the intent of this bill—namely, the deportation of Harry Bridges and other labor leaders that have been engaged in militant and conscientious labor activities.

It is obvious that Mr. FORD'S bill is merely intended to satisfy personal prejudice, antiunion and antilabor sentiments, and has no relation at all to promote the economic, social, and political welfare of our country.

As you know, Mr. Bridges, after an open and objective hearing, was completely exonerated by the trial examiner, Dean James M. Landis.

We are confident that intelligent Congressmen and Senators will brand Mr. FORD'S attempts as completely un-American and that his bill will be promptly consigned to the wastebasket.

Respectfully,
SAN FRANCISCO DISTRICT INDUSTRIAL UNION COUNCIL,
HERMAN STUYVELAAR, Secretary-Treasurer.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a radio address made by me on Washington's Birthday.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. JENKINS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a short article I have here, published by a very strong Democrat in my section.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

THE DIES COMMITTEE

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to express my opposition to the Dies committee holding its hearings in secret.

From press reports we are to believe this is necessary lest possibly unpleasant political questions might be raised which could have an ill-effect on the coming Presidential campaign. To avoid this it is proposed that the hearings be held in secret.

Granted open sessions of this committee may have political repercussions, desirable or otherwise. What of it? Of what political party or faction are those who advocate this procedure so solicitous that they would resort to this secret procedure? We thought the committee was instructed by Congress to investigate communism and communistic activities in the United States. It is our impression it was to search out their sources and fearlessly expose them wherever they might be found, regardless of whether any political faction might be helped or injured.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of New Jersey. I would like to say that the Dies committee did not vote secret hearings. It did appear in the press, however, that the committee was considering secret hearings, but the Dies committee never did vote secret hearings.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. I am glad to hear that. I understood that to be the case. I understand also the gentleman from New Jersey, a member of the committee, is opposed to holding these meetings in secret. However, according to newspaper reports the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES], chairman of the committee, has proposed that these meetings be made secret.

Would not any other course the committee might pursue be dishonorable? Would it not be a clear breach of trust?

Indeed, does not the raising of this question cause suspicion of preconceived bias in those who raise it?

To hold these meetings in secret would be wrong in any event. In the first place, the committee is not guided by any fair rules of procedure having the approval or sanction of the public or which could receive judicial approval. This is not our criticism but that of members of the committee itself in the recent discussion in the House relating to the extension of the life of the committee. Though members of the committee at that time expressed their desire to adopt rules of procedure, the public has no assurance that such rules, even if adopted, would always give full protection to the citizens who appear before it. Under these conditions we should be short-sighted and arrogant indeed if we did not recognize the danger of injuring witnesses and suspects. Under such circumstances the power which the committee has to summarily order these people to appear before it for investigation is by no means a light procedure, even if it is done openly before the public. To do this in secret is going entirely too far, and Congress should put its foot down on it and in no uncertain way stop any such attempt.

Every man is entitled not only to his day in court but in open court. Furthermore, no man is guilty until he is so proven by a properly constituted court. It should be fully recognized that the work of this committee is of such a nature as to require each one of its members to be exceedingly fair and wholly unbiased. The members who are possessed of these qualities have no need whatever for secret meetings. Should there be any who do not have them they are wholly unfit to serve on the committee.

To hold these meetings in secret would be unwarranted, entirely un-American, subversive of the very purpose for which they are intended. They would be directly in line with the machinations of communism and totalitarianism, the very thing Congress authorized it to expose.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include a short resolution from the Oregon Farm Bureau on reciprocal trade agreement extension.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

ST. LAWRENCE-GREAT LAKES WATERWAY DEVELOPMENT

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, the two Governments, Canada and the United States, for several weeks have been negotiating a new treaty having to do with the St. Lawrence waterway program. This proposition means more to the consumers of the United States than anything else that will come before Congress for consideration at this session. It means that the Atlantic seaboard will be moved some 2,770 miles inland, and Duluth, Minn., where I reside, will become the head of navigation for the Atlantic seaboard. There is only one thing that will stop the march of progress and that is failure of ratification of that treaty in the Congress of the United States.

TREATY—CANADA AND THE UNITED STATES

Mr. Speaker, there are hopeful indications that we may expect a treaty between the Governments of Canada and the United States providing for the St. Lawrence-Great Lakes waterway development, a project that has been described as one of the greatest engineering undertakings of modern times. It is as important to the people of the North American Continent as was the building of the Panama Canal. In 1933 and 1934 a similar treaty was negotiated between the United States and Canada. It was submitted to the Senate of the United States for ratification, but met with defeat by the narrow margin of four votes. It may be expected that the new treaty will again come before the Senate of the United States for consideration before this session of Congress adjourns. It behooves every friend of the St. Lawrence seaway project to furnish the Senate with information as to the value of this project to the United States. The new treaty will be referred to a Senate committee where hearings will be held and interested proponents and opponents will be given an opportunity to present their views.

DEEPENING OF CHANNELS

If a treaty is ratified, it means that the ocean or Atlantic seaboard will be moved inland to Duluth, Minn., and Superior, Wis., at the extreme western end of Lake Superior, a distance of 2,770 miles. Every city and harbor on the Great Lakes shares this advantage. Certain channels in the St. Lawrence River will have to be deepened so that ocean-going vessels with a draft of 25 or 30 feet can pass through the same. Until these channels are deepened neither the eastern seaboard, nor the Middle West can have the advantages that come from ocean transportation rates. I do not here discuss the details, for the cost and other factors are just details. Nor do I talk about the vast amount of new electric power that will be created. That, in itself, is an unanswerable argument for the deepening of the channels.

OPPOSITION TO SEAWAY

This proposition to build a seaway to Duluth, Minn., is not a new one. People interested in doing things that will benefit the people of the world have backed the plan with time and energy in the years past. The march of progress requires that natural resources be used and developed for the general welfare of all the people. Also, the same law of conduct means that cheaper means of transportation inure to the advantage of every consumer on the continent.

Strange indeed therefore is the fact that we find powerful opposition to the ratification of a treaty with Canada. I have before me a communication from the Niagara Frontier Planning Board of New York State claiming that support for the seaway is based on a 1934 report that is unreliable, and calling attention to a resolution now pending in the House of Representatives for further investigation.

The communication states that there is opposition to the St. Lawrence seaway from the Maritime Association of Boston, the Maritime Association of New York City, the port authorities of New York City and Albany, the Virginia port authorities, the Lake Carriers' Association, the Association of American Railways, and also other groups and organizations.

NO BASIS FOR OPPOSITION

As I have indicated, the opposition is desperate, for the feasibility and great value of the waterway has been investigated and favorably determined many times. In 1909 there was created the International Joint Commission to deal with boundary waters between the United States and Canada. That Commission reported favorably upon the St. Lawrence seaway project. In succeeding years there have been many other favorable reports. We need no further investigation at this time. It can only serve to delay the hopes and aspirations of those who see an inland waterway reaching to the sea.

MISTAKEN POLICY OF RAILROADS

The railroads have always adopted the mistaken idea that any waterway development will injure them. The very reverse is true. There is nothing that can take the place of cheap waterway transportation over long distances. Goods either move by water or they do not move when a long haul is necessary. Rather than see waterway development permitting such movement of freight by water, by the St. Lawrence waterway dug deep enough for oceangoing boats, the railroads would rather see no movement of freight at all. This is a short-sighted policy. Development of great water freight tonnage from the Atlantic seaboard to the inland empire of the West would mean a greater freight tonnage carried by the railroads. It would mean more work for the railroad employees. Every time this proposition comes up railroad employees are misled. They are told that the St. Lawrence waterway means fewer jobs on the railroads, and the usual propaganda is carried on to get the railway workers to help defeat the project. As I have pointed out, the waterway means more freight to be handled by the railroad employees in the Midwest, and more work for them.

THE MENACE OF SECTIONALISM

There is a philosophy adopted by some of our friends in the East that considers anything of advantage to another section of the United States, ipso facto, to be to the detriment of the East. Any such viewpoint would naturally consider the St. Lawrence seaway project to be terribly bad if it benefited the great Northwest, with a population of 40,000,000 people. I prefer the sounder doctrine that what is for the good of one section of the United States is for the good of all the people of this country. What harms one portion of our people harms all of them. The more advantages that the Northwest gains through projects such as the St. Lawrence seaway the more value it is to other sections of the United States. Not all of the East is sectional. Many eastern sections, and this is true of New York likewise, recognize that the St. Lawrence seaway project will benefit both the Midwest and the Atlantic seaboard. I congratulate them upon their broad viewpoint.

ATLANTIC SEABOARD WILL BENEFIT FROM WATERWAY

In 1929, Henry I. Harrington, president of the Boston Chamber of Commerce, prepared a book called New England and the St. Lawrence seaway. To those easily alarmed and frightened by the thought that what the northwest gains by the seaway, in corresponding proportion will other sections lose, I sincerely commend this book. Mr. Harrington points out that, with few exceptions, the Atlantic seaboard will gain by the building of the St. Lawrence seaway project. He says on page 32 of his book, in giving his views, based on careful study:

> I am convinced that the St. Lawrence seaway is of as great importance to New England as to the Middle West, and that New England should unitedly, heartily, and enthusiastically support the project.

What Mr. Harrington said 11 years ago is just as true today. When this project is studied without fear or prejudice, and with an open mind, the party interested will reach the same conclusions as were reached by Mr. Harrington.

SOME ORGANIZATIONS FAVORING THE SEAWAY

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Wednesday next, after the disposition of business on the Speaker's table and the legislative program for the day, I may address the House for 15 minutes on the Potomac Electric Power Co.; and I ask that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] be present, because I want to show that the Potomac Electric Power Co. is earning about 10 percent on its invested capital, not 60 percent, as some people would have us believe.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wonder if the distinguished gentleman from Williamsport, Pa.——

Mr. RICH. Woolrich, Pa.

Mr. RANKIN. Williamsport—would also mind discussing the enormous overcharges the people of the Williamsport area of Pennsylvania are now having to pay for electric light and power.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I can take up only one city at a time. It will take me 15 minutes to convince the gentleman from Mississippi in regard to the Washington situation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he may address the House for 15 minutes on next Wednesday after the disposition of the legislative program for the day?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a copy of an address delivered by Hon. James A. Farley, Postmaster General, at a public banquet preceding the first-day sale of the Samuel L. Clemens commemorative stamp, Mark Twain Hotel, Hannibal, Mo., on Monday, February 12 last.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

THE LATE ROYAL C. JOHNSON

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Veterans' Association of the House, I ask unanimous consent that on next Monday, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, 1 hour may be devoted to memorial exercises for our former colleague, the Honorable Royal C. Johnson, first chairman of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I will not object because I hope the request will be granted, I want to ask those who served with Royal Johnson, particularly the veterans, to be here next Monday when eulogies will be paid to the memory of our former colleague, who was wounded in the World War and who was the first chairman of the Veterans Committee. Mr. Speaker, I trust the request will be granted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that on Monday next, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, 1 hour may be devoted to a memorial service for the late Royal C. Johnson. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE TRADE-AGREEMENTS PROGRAM

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota?

There was no objection.

Mr. H. CARL ANDERSEN. Mr. Speaker, I take this minute to do what I did not have opportunity to do Friday afternoon because of the lack of time. It was a typical case of gag rule and limited debate such as always seems to arise when agricultural measures are being considered.

In particular I want to thank two Members on the Democratic side of the House, the gentleman from Washington [Mr. SMITH] and the gentleman from Montana [Mr. O'CONNOR], who saw fit to support the National Farm Bureau Federation amendment as exemplified in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CARLSON]. As a member of the Farm Bureau, I want to express to them sincere appreciation, they being the only two Democratic Members who stood up and thus acknowledged the need for the amendment as expressed by the Farm Bureau Federation convention last November. [Applause.]

REPUBLICAN CANDIDATES

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, it has been frequently insinuated by my colleagues on the left that I am too harsh in my criticism of the minority. I do not feel that I ever have been critical, but, if some have regarded my remarks as such, I wish to say they have been in just criticism of the Republican Party and not of any individual Member. However, today, not in criticism of the Republican Party or any Member, I wish to commend the minority leader the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] upon his splendid judgment in resigning from the Republican National Committee. It appears to me again that he is a gentleman of keen insight and judgment, unwilling to be used by the caliber of Presidential candidates of his party.

Mr. Speaker, at this time I also wish to congratulate another outstanding Republican, the great little fighting giant, mayor of New York, Mayor LaGuardia, who has given such good advice to the Republican candidates now in the field and who, if I have not misread the reports, made it plain to the American people that there is only one candidate that deserves their unanimous support, and that is our great President, Franklin D. Roosevelt. I feel that the American people will demand of him that he again serve in the interest of our country and the world for another 4 years, and in the interest of humanity and democracy he will be compelled to do so. [Applause.]

FISH RESTORATION AND MANAGEMENT PROJECTS

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 6321) to provide that the United States shall aid the States in fish restoration and management projects, and for other purposes, previously referred to the Committee on Ways and Means, be rereferred to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. BUCK]?

There was no objection.

HOUR OF MEETING TOMORROW

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN]?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a letter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LAMBERTSON]?

There was no objection.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The SPEAKER. This is District of Columbia Day. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH].

AMENDMENT OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION ACT

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I call up the bill (H. R. 7265) to amend the District of Columbia Unemployment Compensation Act, and I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH]?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman explain this bill?

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to do that. The only purpose of this amendment is to withdraw newspaper carrier boys under 18 years of age from the provisions of the present act. It is very difficult to keep proper records of these boys whose employment is irregular. They do not need the protection of the law and it is felt by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia that this bill should be passed. The measure is brought to the House with the unanimous report of the committee.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH]?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 1 (a) of the District of Columbia Unemployment Compensation Act, approved August 28, 1935, as amended, is further amended by adding a new paragraph:

"(7) Service performed by an individual under the age of 18 in the delivery or distribution of newspapers or shopping news, not including delivery or distribution to any point for subsequent delivery or distribution."

SEC. 2. This amendment shall be effective January 1, 1940.

With the following committee amendments:

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, that completes the calendar for the District of Columbia Committee.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL—1940

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8341) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, to provide supplemental appropriations for such fiscal year, and for other purposes; and pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that general debate shall continue for 2½ hours, to be confined to the bill and the time to be equally divided between myself and the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM]?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has this bill been reported?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Yes; it has been reported.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve all points of order against the bill.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the gentleman from New York reserves all points of order against the bill.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM]?

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, I have a great many requests to speak on this bill, and I am going to take care of them the best I can. I hope when the controversial items are reached the Committee may be reasonably liberal under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Just so we finish the bill today.

Mr. TABER. I do not know about other items, but there is one item that will take quite a while.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM]?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8341, with Mr. WHITTINGTON in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the first deficiency bill, 1940, just presented, was based on an aggregate of Budget estimates of $94,039,843.11. The bill carries a total of $90,069,139.11. The committee made reductions in the estimates totaling $4,020,704. One item of $60,000,000 was added to the bill in the full committee. I believe I shall say just a word about that at this time and leave a more detailed discussion of it to be given by one of the gentlemen more familiar with the subject.

It seems that a situation has developed with respect to the fund of the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year 1940 for making soil-conservation and domestic-allotment payments under the soil-conservation program. When the Department of Agriculture fixed the rates to be paid farmers under the 1939 program, of course they had no accurate way of knowing how many would participate in that program. There has been a much larger participation than was expected. Congress also, by the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, authorized an increase in the small payments. The cost of this increase was estimated, but the amount due to this cause has been larger than could be foreseen. These two factors, increase in small payments and larger participation than expected, make necessary an additional $24,000,000. The law also authorizes advances to farmers for grants of aid—fertilizer, and so forth—and for crop insurance, and provides for payment of expenses of county associations, these costs all to be deducted from amounts of payments finally due to farmers. This latter group of expenses amounts to $36,000,000 and represents an adjustment between fiscal years 1940 and 1941. This character of expense is recurring each year and there will need to be adjustments also in the future as between 1942 and 1941, and so forth. The total of these two sums, $24,000,000 and $36,000,000, or $60,000,000, was placed in the bill with the very distinct understanding, I wish to emphasize, on the part of the Department of Agriculture, the Executive, the Bureau of the Budget, the Appropriations Committee of the House, and the agricultural leaders in the Senate, that an equivalent amount will be deducted from the agricultural appropriation bill, 1941, which is now pending in the Senate committee. If the House today approves the $60,000,000 in this bill, then I confidently believe the House expects the conference committee on the agricultural bill, when they bring that bill here with Senate amendments, to see to it that a corresponding reduction is made in the amount in that bill in the item of $498,560,000 for soil-conservation and domestic-allotment payments. This $60,000,000 is merely lifted, if this agreement is carried out, from that amount. It does not increase the Budget or the amount ultimately appropriated for this purpose, but it has the effect of lifting it out of the bill which is pending in the Senate and which would not become a law soon enough to meet these payments, and putting it in this deficiency bill. So I want to emphasize that point in this presentation to the Committee of the Whole, with the confident expectation that at the proper time the agreement that we have had with these gentlemen will be lived up to.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I am wondering if the acting chairman of the deficiency subcommittee is at liberty to quote the statement of the chairman of the subcommittee on agriculture of the House Committee on Appropriations in regard to this matter.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Yes; I feel confident I may with propriety quote the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON]—I do not see him on the floor at the moment—because he gave to the full committee the assurance that the House conferees would see to it that that amount was deducted from the bill pending in the Senate and stated that the leaders on the Appropriations Committee in the Senate had assured him they would make such a reduction.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. The only way the amount can be deducted is by the Senate doing it. The House cannot deduct anything from that bill at this time. We have passed on it and it is up to the Senate now. Unless the Senate will take it out we cannot stop it.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. If the House puts this amount in the bill today, we are entirely at the mercy of the Senate, the Executive, the Bureau of the Budget, and the Department of Agriculture keeping faith with the House on this item. As far as I am concerned, I am not going to make a kick about it because I hope the time has not come when we have a definite and distinct understanding that we do not live up to it.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. The gentleman did not say so, but I suppose he implies that he has a Budget estimate for this $60,000,000.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Word just came in this morning, so I am told, by a radiogram from the President that he had approved the Budget estimate.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Came in from where?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. From the President, on the high seas.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I am going to raise the question of the legality of such a procedure.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Of course, the gentleman from Kansas knows that the House can put the item in a bill whether it has a Budget estimate or not, but when the Deficiency Subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations had the hearing on the matter they did not put the item in the bill because there had been no Budget estimate. I feel confident that the full committee in its session this morning would not have put the item in the bill except for the fact that a radiogram from the President of the United States was received stating that he had signed the Budget estimate and that in due course of time it would be in the hands of the Congress.

There is another point involved, that had this item not been put in the bill in the House it undoubtedly would have been put in in the Senate. We feel that Members of the House who are interested in this subject have some right to take care of these problems without always waiting for it to go to the other body.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MAHON. Does not what the gentleman is saying simply mean that whereas the House in the agricultural bill appropriated $500,000,000 for soil conservation and domestic-allotment-plan payments, if this amount is placed in this bill the $500,000,000 will be reduced to $440,000,000, and the expenditure over a 2-year period will be identical?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. That is the correct inference.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the $60,000,000 to which the gentleman has referred take care of the payments that are due those farmers who participated in 1939 under the Agricultural Adjustment Act but have not received their entire payments for the year 1939?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. That is the purpose of putting it in the bill, I may say to the gentleman, and that is the reason that motivated the committee in accepting it.

I do not want to take up a lot of the time of the Committee, so I shall very briefly outline some of the more important items in this bill.

There is an item in here with regard to W. P. A. which I believe should have a very brief explanation. When we passed the relief act of the current fiscal year we placed a limitation of $50,000,000 on the amount which might be used by W. P. A. for administrative expenses, reducing by $20,100,000 the amount the Budget had requested to be used for administrative expenses. We did not take the money out of the bill, but we placed a limitation on the amount which might be used for administrative expenses, and that limitation was $20,100,000 less than the Budget had placed it, thereby having the effect of making $20,100,000 more of their funds available to pay relief clients rather than to pay administrative employees.

The committee knew, of course, when we made that drastic reduction that it was a drastic reduction, and we meant to make a drastic reduction, but before the bill had finally passed and became law Works Progress Administrator Colonel Harrington, conferred with the conferees of the House and the Senate and demonstrated rather forcefully that the cut had been so drastic that his administrative set-up in the several States and the District would be so cut that, perhaps, we would accomplish the very reverse of what we were trying to accomplish, which was a better administration of W. P. A.; and the committee unanimously agreed tentatively with the Works Progress Administration that at this session of Congress we would make some further relaxation in that limitation on administrative expenses. The amount discussed then was that there would probably be another $6,000,000 needed. W. P. A. has made some reductions and made a good deal of progress in trying to straighten out their administrative difficulties and in curtailing the expenses of salaries, communications, travel, printing and binding, and so forth, but they do need this $3,950,000 for administrative expenses, and there is carried in this bill authority for W. P. A. to use of their funds not exceeding an additional $3,950,000 for administrative expenses.

May I reiterate that this is not increasing the amount appropriated for W. P. A., it is further liberalizing the amount they may use for administrative expenses. We understand they will go through the fiscal year without asking for a deficit and, perhaps, have an unexpended balance; and I would like to emphasize at this point that this is one of the few times that the relief program has gone through the year without some kind of a deficiency or supplemental amount being asked of the Congress. I believe the Congress can take some measure of credit for reforms written into W. P. A. and for its careful check and supervision of its program, which has made this possible.

There is an item carried for forest-fire control of $3,550,000. It has been the custom for many years to carry a nominal item of $100,000 in the agricultural appropriation bill for fighting forest fires on Government reservations.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question on forest-fire protection?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MOTT. Is that the same amount that has been carried heretofore?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. No; this is the amount estimated by the Budget. What amount does the gentleman refer to as being the same amount that has been carried heretofore?

Mr. MOTT. One hundred thousand dollars for forest-fire protection.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Yes; the custom has been always to carry $100,000 for fighting forest fires, and after the season is over to appropriate whatever they have used of their own funds for that purpose.

Mr. MOTT. And was that amount carried last year?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. One hundred thousand dollars is carried every year, but we appropriate at the end of the session whatever they have had to use for fighting fires.

Mr. MOTT. And this year it is $3,550,000?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Yes; they cannot anticipate how much it is going to amount to.

Mr. MOTT. There used to be an item in the agricultural bill of $80,000 to help take care of forest-fire protection on land under the jurisdiction of the Interior Department. That was dropped, and I was wondering, when the gentleman mentioned this item, whether it had been restored.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. This is not the same item. This is under the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. MOTT. This item of $80,000 was carried in the agricultural appropriation bill, but it was for the purpose of fire protection on lands under the jurisdiction of the Interior Department, such as revested grant land. That is not carried here?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. That is not in this bill, and I do not know about the other bill.

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. CARLSON. I notice the Budget recommended an appropriation of $3,000,000 for the Bureau of Entomology and Plant Quarantine for insect-pest control and the committee is recommending $2,000,000, a reduction of $1,000,000. Evidently the committee had some reason for making that reduction.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. The reason is that they have a $400,000 carry-over. As the gentleman knows, this fund has been largely used for grasshopper control, and we have been told by the Department of Agriculture and the Bureau of Entomology that these surveys indicate the grasshopper infestation should not be as intensive as last year. We are hopeful that the $2,400,000 will take care of the grasshoppers, the chinch bugs, and the other pests.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Referring to the $3,550,000 item under the head of Forest Service, do I understand that this total amount of $3,550,000 will be available for the purpose of putting out and suppressing fires in the Government and forest reservations throughout the country?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. No; it is not available for it; it is to reimburse other appropriations that have already been spent. We have always handled this program by letting them use their general fund and then reimbursing them because we cannot anticipate what their needs may be. They will proceed in the next year just as they have done this year and use whatever funds they have to use for forest-fire fighting, and we will then reimburse them just as we have always done.

Mr. O'CONNOR. May I ask what the gentleman's attitude will be in the event we have a dry season in the forest territory, as we have been having in the past, and fires break out and we have not sufficient money with which to put them out? What will be the gentleman's attitude about an emergency bill or a deficiency bill covering such a situation?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. That will not be necessary, because they are authorized to use their general funds for that purpose and come in and be reimbursed. They have never had any difficulty about that item.

Mr. O'CONNOR. And I ask the same question with relation to the amount set forth in the bill providing for insect control. Suppose we have another outbreak of grasshoppers and other insects such as we have had in the past, what will the gentleman's attitude be in the future with reference to a deficiency appropriation or an emergency bill to take care of such situation?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. We will try to give it careful and sympathetic consideration.

Mr. Chairman, just one other item I want to mention which I think we will hear a good deal about. That is the item of $5,000,000 for the housing census. The committee put this in the bill. In the first place there is a Budget estimate. In the second place, it is authorized, and in the third place, as late as February 8, on the direct issue, on a roll call on the appropriation bill providing for the Departments of State, Commerce, and Justice, for 1941, which carried $2,166,000 for this housing census, the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] moved to recommit the bill and to take the money out of the bill and provide that none of the funds should be used for the housing census. On that roll call the vote was yeas, 135, nays, 210. Therefore, with such an emphatic recent expression of the sentiment of the House, plus the facts shown in the hearings, and the House having expressed its desire to have the housing census taken, it was stated, and not controverted, that it could be taken while the population census was being taken at just about half what it would cost at any other time—under those circumstances, the committee felt fully justified in placing the item in the bill.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. McLEOD. It is a fact, is it not, that at the time the vote was taken it was the general understanding of the House that there was to be no penalty for refusing to answer these questions?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I do not know what the understanding of the House was, but the direct issue was raised, and the roll call which is in the RECORD of February 8, on page 1250, shows that on the vote to strike it out, 135 voted yea and 210 nay; so it seems to me that the Committee on Appropriations had specific instructions to put it in this bill. However, it is back here again for the consideration of the Committee.

Mr. STEFAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. STEFAN. The gentleman will agree that there is considerable opposition to this census because of some embarrassing questions that are to be asked.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I have understood there is considerable opposition to some of the questions to be asked in taking the housing census, but it is understood they are usual questions.

Mr. IZAC. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. IZAC. I notice on page 2, the appropriation for rivers and harbors has been cut to $1,500,000 from the Budget estimate of $2,000,000. Would the gentleman seriously oppose an amendment to put that $500,000 back?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. What appropriation?

Mr. IZAC. For the dredging of San Diego Harbor.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I do not now recall the details of that. It seems to me that the committee came to the conclusion that work could be carried on as rapidly as they needed now considering the funds they have had, the money in this bill, and the allocation to be carried in the regular 1941 bill. If the gentleman can make any showing, he will have an opportunity to do so. The committee thought that would be a sufficient sum to carry on the work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has again expired.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes. I am going to confine what I have to say to one subject in this bill, because if I have anything else to say it will be said with reference to amendments that might be offered. There is an item on page 9, line 15, extending over to page 10, line 2, for $5,000,000 for part of the so-called housing census. This is the situation as I view it. Unless this Congress comes to a realizing sense of its responsibility and stops inquisitorial practices such as are set forth in the hearings on pages 124 to 127, inclusive, with reference to this housing census, this country is in a bad way. That is one feature of the housing census. It is an inquisitorial proposition. They want to know the monthly rental, the monthly value of the property, they want to know the number of persons living in the property, the rental value of the property, and they want to know how much money these people have available to expend. They want to know about the mortgages on the property and almost every other conceivable thing. There seems to be a concerted movement on the part of the people of the country in opposition to this proposition. In many cases housewives are organizing, stating that they will take the broom to these census enumerators. I am receiving letters by the dozen from all over the country. Is it not about time that we became responsive to what confronts us in the country? That is one feature of the proposition. The other is this.

This housing census is conceived as part of a larger housing program, one which has already gotten the Government of the United States into debt $1,600,000,000 for guaranties to these localities who have constructed these outfits, and it is designed by the promoters to get the country into debt many billions of dollars more.

The result of these housing operations of the Federal Government has been business stagnation on the part of the building industry, and just so long as we go along with that kind of performance we will have stagnation. There is only one way to bring about economic recovery in this country and to put the housing industry of this country to work, and that is to meet our Federal situation, balance our Budget, stop the foolish wasting of the people's money. There is never going to be a better time to start than right now. If we stop this operation, if we throw out this $5,000,000, we will not only save $5,000,000, but we will save $8,000,000, because stopping this money right here means that we will stop the whole housing census program. We will get rid of that inquisitorial performance and we will set the star of hope burning in the breasts of the American people, because we will have done something to stop the wasting of money by the billions, which has been going on for the past 8 years and which has prevented the possibility of economic recovery.

Now, the question is, Is there going to be any sense of responsibility on the part of individual members of the House of Representatives, or are we going to be carried away by the press of that crowd which has been endeavoring to foist regimentation and inquisition on the people of this country for the last 7 or 8 years? Have we the courage to stand up and be counted in favor of honest business, in favor of freedom and of saving the people's money, or are we going to be on the run in a continuous state of emergency? Are we going to keep the people of the United States in a continuous state of emergency?

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. REES of Kansas. From what source comes this demand for this expenditure of $5,000,000 to make this inquisition? Who is demanding that we spend this $5,000,000 to ask the questions enumerated here?

Mr. TABER. From the bureaucrats who believe in regimentation and have no regard for the rights or money of the American people. The whole pressure for that proposition comes from them. Nothing will be sacred enough to any individual so that he can keep it to himself if we go along with the performances that are laid out here.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Are these inquisitors to be under civil service or are they patronage for the party which is in power, who will draw this money?

Mr. TABER. Oh, they will be patronage, of course. There is a possibility of 200 questions in each case with reference to which the family secrets will be available to the inquisitor.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. TABER. I yield.

Mr. REES of Kansas. I would like to call attention to the fact that under some W. P. A. projects, housing information was gathered throughout the States, and I think you will find over in our Library a document which we had here a few days ago, showing a lot of information with reference to housing conditions in this country. It seems to me that if these bureaucrats, who want this information, must have it, they can get it from that source and at least save several million dollars.

Mr. TABER. There are several questions that the W. P. A. could not ask with reference to the intimate affairs of people. This bureaucratic crowd not only wants to spend money, regardless of whether there is any reason for it, but they want to spend it for the purpose of annoying the ordinary citizen of this country. They are so far superior, in their own minds and in their own ideas, to the ordinary folks of this country that they have absolutely no regard for the rights of the people here.

I hope that an amendment will be adopted wiping out this language. [Applause.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I will try to carry on where the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] stopped because of his time limitation and say at the outset that I am definitely opposed to appropriating another dollar for the Census Bureau until they eliminate from their questionnaire certain questions considered by many competent authorities as illegal questions; certainly questions never authorized by any law that I have been able to find.

I have received 10 to 15 letters a day for the past few weeks on this subject, letters coming from very substantial citizens, Democrats and Republicans alike. I recall one letter I received this morning from a man who said:

> I have no objection to filing with the Internal Revenue Department the facts relating to my income. I have no objection to abiding by the laws of my State and filing in the town clerk's office the mortgage that is on my home. But—

He says—

> I definitely do object and will refuse to answer any questions asked me by a political appointee who comes around asking the amount of mortgage on my home, when I pay the interest, whether I reduce the principal at the time I pay the interest, and what my income from various resources amounts to.

The attitude of the Census Bureau on this matter has been all wrong.

I wrote a letter to the Bureau in good faith asking them about these questions that I was hearing about in my mail, but all I got in explanation was the statement that the census had been taken for 150 years. I knew that, but there never has been a census taken where they went into a citizen's home and asked him the amount of his income.

It has been said and will be said today that there is a severe penalty imposed against a census taker who discloses any of the information he obtains. This promise does not mean a thing to the average citizen today, and I will tell you why. The average citizen has lost confidence in the promises of his Government. I hate to admit that fact, but there is the reason, they have lost confidence. We assured the people of the Nation that the contents of their income-tax returns would be confidential, in fact, almost sacred; yet just a few months ago the President, by an Executive order authorized the Internal Revenue Department to turn over to a committee of the Senate, the La Follette Committee, certain income-tax returns. If that can be done with an income-tax return, what assurance has the average citizen that a month or 2 months from now the President will not issue another Executive order making public the information disclosed to the census takers?

And the Members of the House can well be reminded that these questions are to be asked by men who have received their appointment solely and purely because of their political connections. I have no great objection to that, although I do feel that there should not be a man hired for that work until the last of those on the civil-service registers had been used. I realize there are not enough on that list and I have no objection to the remainder of the jobs being used as patronage, but I have no confidence that the information the enumerators obtain will not be noised about, particularly in the small communities.

The suggestion was made on the floor of the House a few days ago that the census enumerators might well be taken from eligibles on the relief rolls, on the waiting list. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] said that that had never been done before and that it will not be done now. It has never been done before because we never before have had 10,000,000 of unemployed on waiting lists for public relief when a census was taken. To say that people on the waiting lists of the relief agency are not competent to take this census is a reflection on the fine men and women on those lists. I know several people in my own district who have one or more college degrees, yet who are standing around waiting for a chance to get 40 hours' work a month from the W. P. A. To brand such people incompetent is, in my estimation, an unfortunate reflection on the W. P. A. waiting list. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Montana [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to point out in this brief time the conditions existing in my own State and surrounding States with reference to insects, grasshoppers, and so forth. I have here a letter from the Farmers' Educational Cooperative Union of America located at Great Falls, Mont. This branch of the union is very well informed. This information may be absolutely relied upon. The letter is addressed to me and reads as follows:

Information coming to this office indicates that the grasshopper and Mormon cricket situations while not as serious as last year, is still extremely critical in some parts of Montana. The area commonly known as the triangle district, which is the high production wheat area of the State, is heavily infested with grasshopper eggs.

The counties of Liberty, Hill, Blaine, Phillips, Choteau, Fergus, Teton, and Pondera are much more heavily infested than was the case last year. We also learn that the situation is critical in parts of North and South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, and Colorado.

The Federal Government owns thousands of acres of land in this area, much of which is set aside for grazing purposes only.

I might say the case is understated, for the Federal Government owns one-third of the acreage of my State.

It is a direct obligation of the Federal Government to care for insect control work on these Federally owned lands.

We also feel, that since the grasshopper is migratory, and insects hatched in other States fly to another doing great damage to crops, it becomes a direct concern of the Federal Government to appropriate money for funds to combat grasshoppers.

The proper form of appropriation would be one in which the original funds of $5,000,000 was set up and an additional appropriation to be made each year to replenish the portion of the fund used. If such legislation were enacted, it would relieve farm organizations and the department of entomology from its continual battle each session of Congress for funds.

I wish particularly to have the chairman's attention to this statement:

We are told that $3,500,000 will be needed. We hope we may have immediate and favorable action on the part of Congress.

The letter is signed by Harold Brown, secretary of the Montana division of this union.

I might say that I am informed that conditions surrounding Montana are about the same as they are in the Dakotas and Nebraska.

I am giving you this information so that you will be better prepared to act on an amendment that I will propose to increase the appropriation to $3,000,000, the amount recommended by the Bureau of the Budget. [Applause.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO].

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, this bill carries an item of $5,000,000 toward paying the expenses of taking the Sixteenth Decennial Census. I opposed the bill providing for a housing census last August, which authorized the expenditure of $8,000,000 to ask the American people a lot of useless questions they have never been asked before in any census. This $5,000,000 appropriation is a part of that $8,000,000 authorization.

Today I introduced a resolution asking that questions 32 and 33 be deleted from the census forms which have been printed under the direction of the Secretary of Commerce, which questions have to do with inquiries into the incomes of the American people. Such questions have never been asked before. I doubt the authority for these questions, as this census is to be taken under the provisions of the act of June 18, 1929. The law of June 18, 1929, provides for the fifteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, providing that it shall be restricted to inquiries relating to population, agriculture, irrigation, drainage, distribution, unemployment, and mines. It is entirely silent upon the income of the people.

Never before have the people of this country been asked by a census enumerator what their income was, how much it was, where they got it.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. If the gentleman will just defer his question, I will yield later if I have time.

In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, under this $5,000,000 appropriation for the housing census the American people, for the first time since the Republic began, are going to be asked some embarrassing questions:

Present amount of outstanding indebtedness on first mortgage or land contract; on junior liens?

Frequency and amount of regular payments on first mortgage or land contract?

Do these regular payments include principal reduction? Yes or no. Real-estate taxes? Yes or no.

Interest rate on first mortgage or land contract?

Type of holder of first mortgage or land contract: Building and loan association, commercial bank, savings bank, life-insurance company, mortgage company, H. O. L. C., individual, other?

I say they are embarrassing questions because the list that has already been prepared and distributed by the Bureau of the Census, Department of Commerce contains two unusual questions. I hope it will be the sense and judgment of this House that certain of these questions be not asked. I may say an identical resolution has been presented in the Senate to strike out questions 32 and 33. These two questions are:

What amount of money, wages or salary, do you receive, including commissions?

Did this person receive income of $50 or more from sources other than money, wages or salary? Yes or no.

I hope these questions may be stricken entirely from the census questionnaire in order that the American people may be spared from being compelled to divulge their most intimate and private affairs. These questions are going to be asked them beginning April 1 of this year unless this Congress corrects this glaring inquisition.

I understand that the Secretary of Commerce justifies questions 32 and 33 of the census on the ground that those two questions, relating to the income of the people, are akin to population.

There is not a Member of this House who could not think of a lot of questions that might be delicate and intimate, and yet have more to do with population, but it is inconceivable, and I think the Members will agree with me, that the income of the individual has anything to do with population.

I want to call your attention to a few of the questions that are going to be asked through this appropriation. If you are not at home when the enumerator comes, and that enumerator may be your neighbor, your political enemy, your competitor in business, or someone in the neighborhood who would glory in having the information that they would obtain, and which you will be forced to give under penalty of either paying a fine or going to prison if you refuse to answer, or both, your wife will have to answer. I want you to listen to some of the questions you are going to be asked if this $5,000,000 is appropriated.

I hold in my hand a preliminary list of inquiries given out by the Department of Commerce on this very subject. This is what your wife is going to be asked if you are not at home:

> Toilet facilities in structure; flush toilets; for exclusive use or shared flush toilets. Other outside toilet or privy. Bathtub or shower with running water in structure, for exclusive use or shared with other householders—

And so forth. In addition to that you are going to be asked the amount of mortgage on your home, the rate of interest, whether or not you have kept up your payments, how much your payments have been, and whether or not the regular payments include principal reduction. Yes or no. Real-estate taxes. Do you pay them? Yes or no. Then in addition to that, the wife might be asked whether or not she has been married one, two, or three times before, her age at the time of her first marriage, what language was spoken in her home during her childhood, how many children she had. That is the type of questions that a freedom-loving people are going to be asked beginning the 1st of April of the present year if this appropriation of $5,000,000 is retained in the bill.

I hold in my hand a copy of the census questions that are going to be submitted. It contains some fifty-odd questions. The two objectionable questions on this list are numbers 32 and 33. These two are asked because the Secretary of Commerce, as I understand it, claims they are akin to population: The amount of money, wages, or salary received, including commissions. Did this person receive income of $50 or more from sources other than money, wages, or salary?

Mr. REED of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. REED of New York. I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that for the first time in the history of the country Harry Hopkins has placed a question in the regular census relating to income.

Mr. DONDERO. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. It is not enough that those who are fortunate enough to have an income large enough on which they pay income taxes to have to submit information directly to their Government, and no one complains about that, but this is an entirely different proposition. These questions are going to be asked by people who live in your community. You will be forced to divulge information as to your private affairs.

Mr. HARNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HARNESS. Can the gentleman tell us under what authority they put those questions in there?

Mr. DONDERO. I may say that the questions for the census of 1940 are predicated upon the law of 1929. There is no authority except that the Secretary of Commerce, as I have been informed, claims that in broad phraseology he has a right to ask those questions on the basis that the question of income is akin to population.

Mr. HARE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. HARE. I did not intend to elaborate on the purpose or value of this particular appropriation, but I do want to call the gentleman's attention to what appears to be an error when he said that at no time in the history of this country had the Government made inquiry with reference to the income of the people. I call his attention to the operations of the Labor Department and every other department of the Government, as well as every special investigation that has been made by the Government, going back to 1908, if I recall correctly, when the Congress authorized a special investigation into social and economic conditions of the women and child wage earners of this country. There the regular schedules specifically requested of each individual the type of work he or she was performing, the rate of wage he or she was obtaining, the total weekly wages and the monthly wages, and the yearly income.

Mr. DONDERO. Was any of that ever taken under a census?

Mr. HARE. Not under what we know as a decennial census; but it was a schedule authorized by the Congress and carried into the homes of hundreds of thousands of people, possibly millions of people, who were engaged in industry, and it obtained from them the daily, weekly, monthly, and yearly income—presumably for the purpose of ascertaining the social and economic condition of these people with the idea that possibly appropriate legislation might be enacted for their benefit.

Mr. DONDERO. Now, just a moment. I yielded only for a question—not for a speech.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 additional minutes to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MICHENER. Reverting to the gentleman's observation concerning the confidential nature of the information asked, I may say that I am receiving many protests along that line. This is an excerpt from one letter:

> Now, my complaint is largely that local people should never be assigned to work of this nature, and I am sure that had I known beforehand that the person was a member of the family of my competitor in business I would never have consented to give her the confidential information wanted, as I am quite sure that it will not be treated as confidential in the community.

Mr. DONDERO. I thank the gentleman for his contribution.

In answer to the gentleman from South Carolina, may I say that this is an entirely different proposition. In this case the information is to be obtained by people living in your own community, who may know you, or who may be your most bitter enemy and would just relish and feed upon the information you would be compelled to divulge under the questionnaire of the census about to be taken.

I hope this appropriation may be deleted or stricken from this bill in order that this inquisition—and that is what it is—may be stopped and the American people not be embarrassed in their homes and in their private affairs, the privacy of which is guaranteed to them under the Constitution of the United States. Eternal vigilance is still the price of liberty. Unless the American people wake up to what their rights are, they may soon have no liberty.

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. KUNKEL. I am very curious to know whether the other censuses to which the gentleman from South Carolina referred carried a criminal penalty for failure to answer.

Mr. DONDERO. I am inclined to believe after listening to my good friend from South Carolina that they were undoubtedly industrial censuses, taken in an entirely different way than a census of this kind, the decennial census. That is the difference between the two, if such censuses were taken. There were no penalties of punishment provided in them, I am sure.

Mr. KUNKEL. The persons giving the information could answer or refuse to answer as they saw fit?

Mr. DONDERO. I am not able to say definitely on that, but undoubtedly those censuses were different from the census before us at the present time.

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DONDERO. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. LEAVY. The gentleman has referred to questions 32 and 33.

Mr. DONDERO. They have nothing to do with the housing census, I may say to the gentleman.

Mr. LEAVY. That is the point I wanted to get at. The appropriation we have under consideration deals with housing alone?

Mr. DONDERO. That is for housing, yes; and I cited the questions we are going to be asked under that particular census.

Mr. LEAVY. To strike this appropriation out of the bill would not in any way affect the matter that has been discussed by the gentleman.

Mr. DONDERO. It would not affect questions 32 and 33. It would affect the housing census. [Applause.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, there is little that I can add to the observations made by the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from New York, but my interest was aroused by the colloquy between the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from South Carolina a moment ago, when the latter called our attention to the fact that upon previous occasions the Congress had authorized some department of the Government to make a certain type of investigation to gather information concerning conditions in industry. Of course, we have often done that; but I do not believe we have ever embodied in such a resolution a penalty to be imposed against persons who declined to answer. I am quite sure I am right about that. I have been here some years, and I do not recall any investigation of that kind being conducted with a penalty attached that included a possible jail sentence, which is what is involved in this case.

Mr. HARE. If the gentleman from New York would care to have me answer that inquiry, I may say that I am not prepared to say that a penalty was attached, but I am prepared to say that under a rule or regulation issued by the Department to its enumerators or agents the construction of the Department was that Congress had empowered them to compel any individual to answer the questions on the schedule. Just what the penalty would be I shall have to admit I am not prepared to answer, but I may be able to find that out.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I believe the gentleman will find that we never in any such resolution threatened to put people in jail.

While we are on that point, Mr. Chairman, let me read in part section 9 of the law which has to do with this penalty:

> It shall be the duty of all persons over 18 years of age, when requested by the Director of the Census, or by any supervisory enumerator or special agent or other employee of the Census Office, acting under the instructions of the said Director, to answer correctly to the best of their knowledge all questions on the census schedule applying to themselves and to the families to which they belong or are related.

You can see the ramifications of this thing. They can take an 18-year-old boy and put him on the grill about the debts of his mother or his father or his older brother; and if he does not answer, he can be fined or sent to jail, or both. It is an amazing performance. "The family of which he is a member or to which he is related," is the language.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KEEFE. I am wondering if the gentleman has given consideration to a situation such as this. Take the situation in my own case. I have a 21-year-old son who will be the only person at my home available to give this information when the census enumerator calls. What about the value of the information he may give if he is asked questions and attempts to answer those questions? They will call upon him, he will be there, and they will attempt to ask him about my debts and the amount of the mortgage, and all that sort of thing. Of what value will it be for him to attempt to answer questions on matters about which he knows nothing?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, the gentleman is the only person who can give an answer to his question. I do not know how much reliance I would feel in my own son if he happens to be at my office at home when these people come. They might ask him an awful lot of questions. He might wire me to get some of the answers. I would be very slow in replying to that wire—very slow. [Laughter.]

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Aside from the question of the merit or demerit of the proposition which the gentleman is discussing, just to keep the record straight, the gentleman will find on page 115 of the hearings Mr. Austin was asked the question as to what authority there was for asking the questions and for the penalties cited, and he cites section 9 of the act of June 18, 1929, the Decennial Census Act, which had a penalty section in it for faiure to answer questions in the census.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is true. The penalty section which I read in part is lifted, of course, from old law.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. He further stated, however, that he did not think the department had ever resorted to trying to enforce any penalties under it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Maybe so, but I do not believe in granting power to the Government and then hoping it will not use it. [Applause.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, sometimes there is some pretty good information or some good opinion that comes out of old New England. Perhaps we are not quite up to date in that section of the country in New Deal methods or in New Deal methods of taking a census, but I hold in my hand a clipping from a paper published in North Adams, Mass., a very powerful editorial, as it seems to me, which I ask permission to insert in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will have to secure such permission in the House and not in Committee.

Mr. TREADWAY. Then I shall read extracts from the editorial, the title of which covers an entire answer to the problem that is before us at this time. The title of the editorial is "None of Their Business," and that is exactly the way I size up the questions under discussion with respect to the 1940 census at the present time.

The editorial says:

> As a matter of fact, there are questions included which no citizen of a free democracy should be compelled to answer. That those who drew up the prying questionnaire did not realize what the reaction of a normal American would be to such questions as "What is the value of your home, if you own it, or what rent do you pay?" or "What is your race or color?" is surprising, to say the least.

Then it goes on to say:

> Then it was arranged that 2 out of every 40 persons questioned would be required, on pain of a $500 fine or imprisonment, to answer a supplementary list of extremely personal questions regarding previous marriages, divorces, the language spoken at home during his childhood, the birthplaces of his parents, and similar data which, baldly, is none of the Government's business.
> Then there are other questions anent the size of the mortgage, if any, on your home; facts on the heating and cooling apparatus in your home; cost of utility service and appliances.
> And, to top it all, you are supposed to tell the census taker, whoever he or she may be, the amount of money, wages, or salary received, including commissions, you made in 1939, and whether you got an income of $50 or more from other sources.

If there ever was an inquisitorial type of foolish and none-of-your-business questions, there is a sample of them.

Then it says this:

It will be interesting to see if Congress fails to delete the more objectionable questions and eliminate the penalties—and it must go against any American's grain to be told that he'll be fined or sent to jail if he doesn't tell some stranger things which, the chances are, his own brother doesn't know—how many will defy their too curious Government. We have a suspicion that if the penalties were really to be enforced, the jails and courts would be somewhat crowded.

I think this expresses the sentiment of this House better than trying to analyze the questions, and that we are definitely of the opinion that unless these questions are very materially changed, and the Government asks questions that are the Government's business rather than none of their business, as this editorial says, the jails of the country are liable to be filled through an enforcement of the fine-and-penalty provision. The gentleman from New York who just preceded me is apt to be included unless his position as a Member of this House exempts him, because he has stated that he would be very slow to answer his son's inquiries; in other words, he would tell his son that he was not going to answer the inquisitorial nonsense of the census taker.

The questions themselves are extremely objectionable. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARE] spoke of the economic value of these questions. I would like to ask him if, under the housing schedule, there is the slightest economic value in knowing whether you have an individual bathtub or whether you share it with someone else—what economic program does that carry out—and whether the bathtub or shower has running water or not.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Massachusetts 3 additional minutes.

Mr. TREADWAY. The present presiding officer is the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi. He presides excellently over this Committee of the Whole House, and over the committee of which he is the distinguished chairman. I would like to ask him how he is going to use the toilet unless it is a flush one, and whether he would have it for the use of his own house, or share it with his neighbors. This questionnaire does not say where that neighbor must live. Would you have to ask him to make use of the facilities of your house? In this list, there are questions enumerated that might be asked, possibly by the Income Tax Division, but here if you refuse to answer you are to be sent to jail. I would not want to see that happen to such a distinguished gentleman as the presiding officer here; but that is the situation if it is followed out to the letter. Of course, when it comes to questions 32 and 33, you then reach into the very heart of the matter. Why should this census enumerator need to know whether you have received $50, more or less, outside of your salary? Someone must have sat up nights to figure out these ridiculous and improper questions that are incorporated in this census sheet. The only benefit I can possibly see that might come from this ridiculous situation is that if the census enumerator is paid upon the basis of foolish questions asked, then he is going to get a big rake-off; he or she, as the case may be. That is the only benefit that can possibly come from such foolish questions as the public is to be asked to answer.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I think it has been thoroughly established that the interrogations with reference to household equipment are prompted by the building industry and the suppliers of those particular items. If the constitutional provision calling for this census carries with it the power in the Census Bureau to put into this list the interrogatories which some outside pressure group desires to have put to the people and answered, where is there any protection for the people under this scheme of taking the census?

Mr. TREADWAY. There is not supposed to be. It is an inquisitorial proposition that will not protect anybody from anything or do anybody any good.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 minutes more in order to ask him a question. Has the gentleman given consideration to questions 28 to 33, inclusive, in the housing-schedule questionnaire?

Mr. TREADWAY. May I interrupt the gentleman? To start with, there are three different sheets. Will one census enumerator take all of these answers?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. There are three possible censuses with over 300 questions.

Mr. TREADWAY. And the gentleman is asking me about the housing schedule?

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. I refer to the housing schedule questions 28 to 33. They call for information as to the market value of all owner-occupied property, as to whether or not there is a mortgage on the property, as to the present amount of outstanding indebtedness, as to the payments required on the mortgage, if any, whether monthly, quarterly, semiannually, or otherwise; whether the payments include any amount for reduction of principal; whether they include real-estate taxes; what interest is charged on the mortgage and who holds the first mortgage, if any. Does the gentleman think these questions are proper questions or that they serve any useful public purpose?

Mr. TREADWAY. If they serve any public purpose it is for the people who have asked the questions to answer that. It is beyond my mental capacity to give the gentleman any definite reply to the question that he asks.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. Yes. I yield to my neighbor because I may have some mortgages that affect him, or he may have something on me.

Mr. MILLER. Could the gentleman tell me whether, if the enumerator comes to a gentleman's house and asks these questions and does not conclude until Saturday night, he may invite him to make use of the bathtub?

Mr. TREADWAY. Oh, I suppose that would depend upon whether it is shared with somebody else, with a neighbor. I do not think you could, unless you have said that this is not your exclusive toilet and bath. And I do not know whether that applies to both in the same room or not, but at any rate it would definitely apply in some way, and the answer to that question would be how you have answered these previous fool questions in the questionnaire.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TREADWAY. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. I have had a number of letters inquiring about this penalty. For instance, supposing the question is as to the quality and quantity of toilet paper used in each family, and the person interrogated refuses to answer?

Mr. TREADWAY. Is that in here? [Laughter.]

Mr. MICHENER. I have been so informed.

Mr. TREADWAY. Well, it is like the kitchen stove. Everything is in here. If they use the wrong kind of toilet paper, it might clog the plumbing, and then you would get into trouble again, perhaps with an additional fine and imprisonment.

Mr. BOLLES. How about using the Sears-Roebuck catalog? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARE].

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, it will not be my purpose to discuss the merits or demerits of the various interrogatories of this housing census schedule, but in view of the criticism to the effect that this is something new, unheard of, and apparently a trespass upon the rights and privacy of the homes of the people of this country, I want to call attention to an act of Congress providing for an investigation of special census a number of years ago. I read a part of an act of Congress passed June 29, 1907, which is as follows:

That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate and report on the industrial, social, moral, educational, and physical condition of women and child workers in the United States wherever employed, with special reference to their age, hours of labor, term of employment, health, illiteracy, sanitary and other conditions surrounding their occupation, and the means employed for the protection of their health, persons, and morals.

The only criticism that is lacking so far today is that this census schedule does not inquire into the morals of the people, but the resolution referred to, passed in 1907, conducted in 1908, which was a census of woman and child wage earners, did permit inquiries into the morals of such persons. Enumerators first had to get information from the individual homes, or the individual families. They had to inquire of the mothers and daughters and children to get this information. They went a great deal further there than is contemplated in this schedule because they had the right, under that authorization, to inquire into the morals of the individual.

It had been suggested that we might ask a man whether or not he was divorced or married again. Certainly. There is no embarrassment there, if legitimate. That is not a new inquiry.

I want to read some of the inquiries in this schedule, which is a copy of the schedule used back in 1908 by the Bureau of the Census and Bureau of Labor.

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. I yield.

Mr. KUNKEL. I wonder if the gentleman could answer the question that I brought up when the gentleman from Michigan was speaking. Does this one to which the gentleman is referring carry a criminal penalty for failure to answer the question?

Mr. HARE. I cannot answer what penalty it carried because I do not know, but I do know from a historical standpoint that the law provided that the department had the right to compel anyone to answer the questions in the schedule.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. HARE. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. May I repeat my belief that this is the first time in any census for any purpose that a man has ever been required to divulge his income. I maintain that those two questions are definitely without authorization. I grant that these other questions were asked. I do not grant that they were necessary, but I would like to clear up the point as to whether there is any authorization for the question in regard to income.

Mr. HARE. I will read the inquiries on this schedule to which I have referred, and the gentleman can draw his own conclusion.

Mr. MILLER. But the gentleman is evading my question because that would not be an authorization for this purpose, because that was an authorization for the Secretary of Labor to conduct an investigation.

Mr. HARE. No; it was directed to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, there being no Secretary of Labor at that time. The Bureau of Labor was in the Department of Commerce, and the authority to conduct the investigation was lodged with the Bureau of Labor and Bureau of the Census.

Mr. MILLER. But I have not heard anything about income.

Mr. HARE. All right; I will read. This schedule makes, first, the inquiry as to the post office, residence, and address; city, town, and State; the name of head of the family. It then inquires as to the number of years the head of the family has been in the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. HARE (continuing reading):

Race of husband?
Race of wife?
Date of birth?
Occupation?
Earnings during the past year?
Amount paid to family?

That means, of course, whether or not the husband took the money and paid it to the family or spent it somewhere else. Other inquiries are as follows:

Years worked in present industry.
Income of the family from other sources (for example, cow, swine, garden, poultry, etc.).

If that does not find out what a man's income is, I would not know how to proceed; but listen to further inquiries on same schedule:

Total income of family?
Is dwelling owned or rented?
If rented, by whom owned?
Give detailed description of dwelling.
Separate house or rooms in tenement?
Number of stories high?
Number of rooms occupied by family?
Number of rooms used for sleeping purposes?
Character of foundation?
Is house painted?
Is house plastered?
Is house ceiled?
Has house pantries or closets?
How is house heated?
How is house lighted?
Outdoor privy or watercloset?

[Laughter.]

A great deal has been said here about outdoor toilets or inside toilets, but this schedule went further than that. Listen again:

Outdoor privy or watercloset?

Then it goes a little further and it inquires:

By whom is privy cleaned?

[Laughter.]

Now what do you think of that as compared with the schedule that has been so severely criticized here this morning?

There are other inquiries in this same schedule reflecting the amount paid for rent, for fuel used, and whether members of the family used tobacco and the annual cost of same, whether they drank Coca-Cola and the amount spent annually for this innocent beverage; whether they made contributions to the church and how much, whether the family availed themselves of the opportunities for amusement and the amount of the annual bill. The particular schedule from which I am reading shows a detailed description of the house furnishings in one family, as follows:

All old and of the cheapest make. Sitting room contains a bed, couch, sewing machine, a washstand, and a few chairs. Other bedrooms contain beds and chairs only. The kitchen contains a stove and table with the necessary pots and pans. Window shades and curtains of the cheapest material. The sitting room had mats for covering and other rooms were bare. The only pictures of any kind on the wall are the family records hanging above the fireplace.

Proceeding further it says:

The oldest girl and oldest boy go to the city and sometimes attend the theater or moving-picture show. The boys congregate in the company store in the evenings. Sometimes they go to church and to Sunday school.

The same Government report from which I am now reading, found in volume 16 of the report of the Commissioner of Labor, 1910, illustrates the character of the study, investigation, or census made by giving an inventory of the wardrobe of each member of the family. And from the standpoint of privacy I hesitate to read into the record all the inquiries made and articles named in response thereto, but to show the housing census bill now being discussed and criticized does not contemplate inquiries near so embarrassing as those contained in the schedules back in 1908 when the special census or investigation already referred to was taken, I read from this same volume on page 44 where it recites a rather complete inventory of articles bought for one of the daughters of the family (age 21) and the amounts paid for such articles. I quote:

One cloth suit valued at $25; 1 linen suit, $12; 3 cotton waists, $3; 2 percale waists, 60 cents; 1 linen skirt, $2; 1 Persian lawn dress, $6.50; 4 calico dresses, $2.42; 1 gingham dress, 95 cents; 1 silk petticoat, $6; 6 cotton petticoats, $6.50; 4 pairs cotton drawers, $1.87; 2 corsets, $2; 6 corset covers, $3; 4 cotton nightgowns, $4; 3 straw hats, $12; 23 pairs of stockings, $7; 5 pairs shoes, $11.50; 1 pair silk gloves, $2—

And so forth. The point I am trying to illustrate is that the schedules of 1908 certainly contained inquiries that went much further into the privacy of the home and the individual than the inquiries contemplated in the proposed schedule for taking a housing census. If the schedule exhibited here today contained inquiries designed to find out the number and quality of underclothes worn by the mothers and daughters of this country I would certainly vote against this appropriation.

Mr. Chairman, to come before this House and argue against the appropriation on the ground that it is a trespass upon the privacy of the home for the first time in the history of this country is absurd. As I said at the outset, I do not care to enter into an argument as to the wisdom, propriety, or the economic value of these inquiries, but I do want to submit that it is not a new undertaking on the part of this Government. I assume the purpose of the inquiry is somewhat similar to the purpose of the investigation or special census made in 1907, 1908, 1909, and 1910 when the alleged purpose was to make inquiry into the social, educational, and economic condition of women and child wage earners in the United States. If we had the right then, if we had the authority then, and if we could do it then without trespassing upon the privacy or rights of the people, I see no reason why it cannot be done today with equal propriety.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Ohio. Does the gentleman believe it is proper for the Federal Government, or that the Federal Government has the right, to inquire, as a part of census taking, into the morals of any of our citizens?

Mr. HARE. I do not think it is a function of government to try to regulate the morals of the people, no; it is not a function of government. I believe, however, that the Federal Government has a right to collect statistics and information as a basis for legislation for the benefit of the public generally. [Applause.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, we are not living under the Constitution adopted by the fathers in Philadelphia. The people never would have ratified that Constitution had it not been for certain amendments which were later adopted, which amendments constitute the Bill of Rights. In that Bill of Rights, which is a part of the Constitution, are not less than 24 personal liberties for which mankind has fought down through the centuries to obtain; and there they are the bulwark of American liberty, the most-cherished heritage and of more value than anything else in this country to be bequeathed, unimpaired, to their children.

This attempt to select 120,000 local political appointees, armed with authority of law and directed to invade 30,000,000 American homes to pry into their personal affairs, is a violation of the Bill of Rights. Look at section 4 of the Bill of Rights and see the protection that is thrown around the home of the individual. No person, no power of government, can cross that threshold unless by an order of the court after certain facts have been presented showing that either a crime or a near crime has been committed. A sworn statement is required to be presented to the judge; yet here you propose to nullify that provision of safety to individual rights by circumventing it through this means of sending 120,000 snoopers with full authority to cross that threshold and pry from the people information that no power on earth could otherwise obtain except under a court order. It is a reprehensible proposition; and while it would be easy to ridicule these questions, a fundamental principle of liberty is involved here—and I would remind this House that we still have some dignity here; some responsibility to the people; or it should have. We still owe some obligations to a free people who sent us here; and I would read from the words of Thomas Jefferson in reply to the President when he said it was the duty of American citizens to answer these questions and to have confidence in Government officials. Here is what Thomas Jefferson said when the question of confidence was presented to him:

It would be a dangerous delusion if our confidence in the man of our choice should silence our fears for the safety of our rights. Confidence is everywhere the parent of despotism. Free government is founded on jealousy, not in confidence. It is jealousy and not confidence which prescribes limited constitutions to bind down those whom we are obliged to trust with power. Our Constitution has accordingly fixed the limits to which, and no further, our confidence will go. In questions of power, then, let no more be heard of confidence in man, but bind him down from mischief by chains of the Constitution.

That is precisely what the people sought to do in the Bill of Rights, and it is high time that we listened to the voice of a free people who are sick and tired of seeing their individual rights nibbled away by degrees. If you ever pry from the Bill of Rights this plank in section 4 you will have started the whole program of destroying all these 24 individual liberties in the Bill of Rights. So I am here appealing to you as a matter of principle. You are not general agents, you are special agents. Your duties are defined by the Constitution, and I say there is far more reason now for your stopping this snooping program, this invasion of personal rights than as though you were acting directly. But I say to you that a bureaucrat, a bureaucrat has framed these questions, and he has gone far outside of the intent, or the letter, or the spirit of the law enacted by this Congress; and what is worse you have delegated certain authority which he has subverted to his own purposes, and you have delegated rights to a type of man who had the temerity and effrontery to say that "the people are too damned dumb to understand." I wonder if he is sitting down there in his cloistered office smiling away saying the Congress is too damned dumb to interfere in the interest of the people? [Applause.] If you ever vote for this appropriation in this bill you will be placing your stamp of approval upon his act by which he proposes to send the political snoopers into the homes of this country.

I do not propose to have my family insulted by being asked these questions. I remember when the N. R. A. was in vogue, they approached me, they approached my family, and wanted us to sign a pledge card. I refused. Then a man was sent from Washington and said, "What shall I tell the President?" I did not sign that card, neither did my family. I have some rights left as an American citizen and I do not propose to see this Congress dragged down into the mire and slime by delegating inquisitorial powers to a bureaucrat in the Department of Commerce. I urge you as patriots today to assert your rights and the rights of a sovereign people of the United States. It should be your desire to earnestly and sincerely and faithfully represent the people who have honored you with the position you occupy here, not as the spokesman of the Executive but as the spokesman and as the voice of your people. You are here to preserve, protect, and defend the sacred private rights of the people as guaranteed by the Constitution.

I might call your attention to a little bit of old Anglo-Saxon philosophy expressed many years ago when they were fighting for their personal liberties and the protection of the home.

William Pitt, Earl of Chatham, said:

The poorest man in his cottage bid defiance to all the force of the crown. It may be frail; its roof may shake; the wind may blow through it; the storms may enter, the rain may enter—but the King of England cannot enter; all his forces dare not cross the threshold of the ruined tenement.

There is no more sacred place than the American home. Except for the American home there could be no government such as we enjoy, and it is our duty here as representatives of a free people to throw a cloak of protection around those homes. The sanctity of our homes should be kept inviolate. Men are going to come and quiz your wife; men for whom you have no respect whatever, no confidence, perhaps political enemies of yours, as has been stated on this floor; men lacking in character. They are going to take a keen delight in insulting your family if they are unfriendly toward you. Do not think for a minute they will not peddle this information. May I transgress at this point to draw a comparison. At least 130,000,000 people have been propounding a question to our Chief Executive.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 2 additional minutes.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, the sovereign people of the United States have placed in the highest office within the gift of a free people the President of the United States, and they would like to know whether he is going to run for a third term. Why he resented the question, and assumed the purpose was to invade his private affairs, is in conflict with his views on the proposed housing census snooping. May I say that the average sovereign citizen cannot escape the census taker by boarding a ship and heading out into the unknown on the high seas, guarded by two battleships paid for by the taxpayers. No; they have to face the snoopers. If he can decline to answer that question asked by the sovereign citizens, how can he expect the sovereign citizens to betray the confidences of their homes to the census takers that he sends into their houses? We have had experience with the extent to which these things are considered confidential by the Government. We were all told, when they were going to obtain confidential information, that it was to be hermetically sealed and no human eyes were to see it, but when the first case rose in which the people who gave the information were involved, the head of the C. I. O. stepped forward and said: "I have all the information." He had the Government reports. Do not think for a minute this information will not be broadcast to the country in due time if it will serve any political purpose.

The time has come to stop it, and I propose this day that every man here cast a record vote so that every free-born American citizen may see just where his Representative stands on this fundamental issue of liberty.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is my understanding, and my position has been sustained, that article I, section 2, clause 3, of the Constitution, which covers this census-taking authority, carries with it the power that the Bureau can force the people to answer these questions. If a Bureau head becomes so avaricious, as the result of an ulterior motive or otherwise, to ask such personal questions, what is the defense of the people against such intrusion? Can the Congress pass a law which takes away from that Bureau the right to put into forms the questions such as we have discussed here, or is that beyond the power of Congress?

Mr. REED of New York. This Congress has the absolute power within its constitutional rights to see that no bureaucrat under delegated authority trespasses beyond the spirit and the intent of the Congress, speaking for a sovereign people.

Mr. CRAWFORD. And the only way we can do that is to stop this appropriation?

Mr. REED of New York. Stop the appropriation and repeal the law later. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LEAVY].

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Chairman, I do not think any of us would necessarily take issue with the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] on the general statement he has made in reference to protecting the rights of our citizens under the Constitution; but his statements were so general and so foreign to the issue we are considering now that they really have no place here. Let us analyze this matter for a moment.

Last August the Congress passed legislation by a record vote requiring the Bureau of the Census to take a housing census, which is the only thing we are concerned with here. In compliance with that legislation a Budget estimate was submitted to the committee, full hearings were held, a report was made, and the sum involved here was approved by the committee, and now for the purpose of complying with the mandate of this Congress, we seek to make this appropriation.

We come now to the question whether or not a housing census is one so foreign to our economic, social, and political life that it should not be given consideration. If you will turn to page 120 of the hearings you will find that nearly every country in the world takes a housing census. If you will turn to the matter which is really the crux of the argument here, pages 124–125 of the hearings, you will find the 33 questions broken down and made clear. I am willing to state on my reputation as a lawyer and as one who has been on the highest trial bench of my State for 10 years, that you cannot find a single question in this list that even remotely could be considered an incriminating question, not a single one. You can read the list of 33 questions and not find a question that any honest, self-respecting, law-abiding citizen would not gladly, freely answer.

Someone may say, "Why, they will ask you if you have a mortgage and they will ask you what interest you pay on it and they will ask you when it comes due." Those things are all a matter of public record in every county in the land. Someone may say, "Well, they will ask you concerning the number of rooms you have in your house." Surely it is not a crime to tell that. "They will ask you what the water and toilet facilities are in your house." There is nothing criminal in answering that. No private rights are invaded. It is there for anyone to see. Most of us who have modern homes find a pleasure in showing them to friends and acquaintances.

There is a reason, and a sound reason, for asking these questions. I cannot see why gentlemen on the minority side of the House oppose this. We have been asked, and irrespective of which party is in control after 1941, we will be asked to legislate upon these great economic questions from time to time. Our trouble has been and is now that we do not have factual information upon which to act. This is an opportunity for us to get the facts first hand. Then, if the New Deal housing program is found to be an unsound one or an unnecessary one, we will know that we ought to stop it. If, on the other hand, the facts disclose a condition in reference to housing far worse than any of us have yet thought it was, we want to legislate to better that condition. Surely we should not be denied the facts, and that is all this questionnaire is for.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. TABER. This census will not in any way demonstrate the fallacies in the New Deal housing racket, because the problem is, What are they going to do with the people they crowd out of the places they take up, and what are they going to do with the buildings they put up? They cannot find people to qualify to move into the houses they are now building, and they cannot find places for the people who move out of the ones they tear down.

Mr. LEAVY. May I say in answer to the gentleman from New York that I cannot agree with the statement he makes.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 additional minutes to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. LEAVY. It is my belief there are literally millions of Americans who live in shameful hovels. This situation ought to be remedied if it can be remedied. Under this census we will have an opportunity to get the facts as to what housing conditions are, and then perhaps private enterprise will be willing to go into the regions where housing problems are acute and offer their services. At any rate, why should we not have the courage to get the facts and, irrespective of how ugly they may be, try to improve the situation?

With regard to moving someone out of a poor house and putting him into a good one, surely none of us will object to that if it can be done economically and if it is politically sound and socially right.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVY. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. May I say that I endorse heartily what the gentleman has just said about the need of finding out the facts. Exact information is what we need before we can legislate wisely. Have we not heard it said during the past several years that we know nothing about the problem of unemployment, that all our estimates of the number of unemployed are but guesses? Have we not often heard that said?

Mr. LEAVY. We have heard it said very often.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Do we not need more than anything else involving the unemployment problem to find out how many unemployed persons there are? And all we can learn about them?

Mr. LEAVY. We certainly must, and we should also know the home conditions under which they live. We should not be compelled, as we have been during the short time I have been in this Congress, of constantly passing legislation when we know little of what the true facts are. I am sure that if the situation were reversed and the Republicans were in power, with the existing condition as it appears today, you would find the Members on this side of the House supporting an appropriation of this kind for the purpose of securing first-hand factual information that is dependable and reliable and upon which we can act intelligently. Why, Mr. Chairman, should we be afraid to face facts?

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVY. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. Why should it be necessary to give the same information to two bureaus of the Government? The Internal Revenue Bureau has all the information anyone can possibly give them as to the receipts and expenditures, and so on, of individuals as well as partnerships.

Mr. LEAVY. They probably do as to the income-tax payers, but that issue is not involved at all in this measure because here we are only concerned with providing money to take a census of housing. Look through these 33 questions and show me one question that states anything about the individual's income. There is not a question of that type here. These questions deal entirely with the home in which he lives, the conditions surrounding it, and what, if anything, his needs are to bring him up to a fair standard of living. We want to find how many of our citizens live in accordance with our boasted American standard and how many of them live in substandard homes. We all know there are some terrible and shameful places where men, women, and helpless children are forced to live.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is it not wise to curb this constantly growing interference on the part of the Government with the lives of our people?

Mr. LEAVY. When that condition exists, surely it is, but it is the Government's duty first of all to see that the American citizen is given an opportunity to live in the best home America can afford him. This Nation is just as good or bad as its homes are when considered in the aggregate.

Mr. KNUTSON. How is it going to provide anyone with a home to ask him a lot of questions?

Mr. LEAVY. If we have the facts here and if legislation will offer relief, we can intelligently legislate. If legislation does not offer relief, then we can intelligently decline to legislate. My complaint is that we are compelled to act in almost a complete absence of facts. This will bring out the facts concerning the important question of housing.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman is exceptionally intelligent——

Mr. LEAVY. I thank the gentleman, but I must decline to yield further because I want to yield to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Is it not true, as the gentleman sees it, that in the great field of human endeavor and social and economic improvement we have made less strides than we have made with regard to the mechanical arts and sciences?

Mr. LEAVY. There is no question about that.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. And is not that deplorable fact due to lack of factual information with regard to living conditions and sociological data?

Mr. LEAVY. I think very largely so, and here we have an opportunity to get reliable and dependable information.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVY. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. The President has told us that one-third of the people of the Nation are ill-clad, ill-fed, and ill-housed. Does the gentleman think we need any further confirmation of that statement through a census?

Mr. LEAVY. I think it is always well to get the facts first-hand. [Applause.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT].

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, there is absolutely no justification in law, precedent, or morals for the passage of this preposterous proposal. It is truly amazing and shocking to the sensibilities of anyone with a thimbleful of brains that such a perfidious proposition should be brought into a body of free and intelligent men.

What difference does it make to Harry Hopkins, or any other Government official, whether the bathtub in my home or the shower in my home is used exclusively by me or whether it is shared with my friends? These new dealers constructed a dog pound down at Memphis, Tenn., that cost $50,000, equipped with shower baths, where the rich, aristocratic, southern society ladies could give their little poodles a shower bath. There are a lot of good citizens down in the Ozark Mountains of southern Missouri which I have the honor to represent who do not have shower baths in their homes, but we are not as dirty as some new dealers I know, and we do not stink as much as Harry Hopkins and his crew. [Laughter.]

What difference does it make whether I have a toilet used exclusively by myself, shared with my wife or with my guests, or whether we have a privy, or no toilet or privy at all? Of course, those people are in a bad way. [Laughter.] I do not know just what recommendations the Department of Commerce will make to correct the situation of such unfortunate people, but if this lousy—if you will pardon the Hollywood language—if this lousy measure is enacted into law it will invade the privacy and sanctity of the home. We will have another army of spies and snoopers and investigators and regulators riding over this country telling us how to live our lives and how to run our businesses. This bill is as infamous as the old potato-control law which, fortunately, never went into effect.

I notice down here the last question asked is, "Who holds this first mortgage or land contract?" I will tell you what a lot of my constituents will tell these enumerators when they come and ask that question and other questions in this questionnaire. They will just tell them very plainly and emphatically that it is none of their damned business. They will never answer it, and you will have to build a prison on every 40 acres in some congressional districts of this country, where men still love freedom, if you take care of all the people who refuse to answer such silly, embarrassing, and unwarranted questions.

Now, it might be legal to ask these questions, but certainly it is an infringement upon individual liberty and personal rights. It is contrary to the spirit of the men who wrote the Constitution and of our fathers who later wrote the Bill of Rights. Thomas Jefferson, the founder and patron saint of the Democratic Party, said, "That government is best that governs least." This was also the philosophy of Abraham Lincoln. Both the author of the Declaration of Independence and the Great Emancipator believed in a minimum degree of government and in a maximum degree of individual liberty. [Applause.] The New Deal believes just the reverse. Under this administration the individual is swallowed by the state.

One of the greatest deterrents to economic recovery in this country, and the thing that has destroyed the confidence of the American people in the integrity of our Government, has been excessive governmental regulation and control from a centralized bureaucracy. The question at issue is whether we are going to follow the American principle, or turn our backs upon Jefferson and Lincoln, whether we are going to follow the teachings of the stalwart fathers of our American system who once believed in our dual form of government and in States rights and in personal liberty, or whether we want to impose upon the American people an overbearing, cumbersome, and tyrannical bureaucracy. That is the only issue before us. I prefer to follow Thomas Jefferson to following Harry Hopkins. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, shades of Thomas Jefferson, if he should look back and see the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT] following him, as he says he is doing, Jefferson would know that there was something wrong in this country.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] amuse me. When they first sprang this proposition I looked into it and found that it was nothing in God's world but a sounding board to attack the administration through Mr. Harry Hopkins, the Secretary of Commerce.

The schedule simply gives us a cross section of the country, not for the personal benefit of Mr. Hopkins but for the benefit of all the American people.

I was on the conference in 1930 when the question arose of taking a census of radios to find how many people in the United States had radios. At that time we did not have the Rural Electrification Administration, and we never would have had it if we had depended upon the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT] and the Republicans with whom he trains.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman kindly yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes; I will kindly yield.

Mr. SHORT. The gentleman from Mississippi well knows that the gentleman from Missouri supported his amendment vastly increasing the appropriation for rural electrification.

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, yes; after we had it going and you could not stop it, the gentleman voted right one time. One time he voted right on the power question.

Mr. SHORT. And that is one time more than the gentleman from Mississippi did.

Mr. RANKIN. And I will tell the gentleman what I did. I give the gentleman from Missouri credit for having at one time voted right on the power question, but if it had been left to him and his party, where we have electrified more than a million and a half farm homes, they would have been in a complete black-out tonight today.

There was no harm in finding out the number of radios in the country and there is no harm in getting this information here, but the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT] rises in his indignation and talks about going into the privacy of the home to get information. Information for what? To find out the living conditions of the American people in order that we may improve them. Yet last week he voted against every effort to take the hands of the selfish interests out of the pockets of the American farmers. He does not care about the tariff barons reaching into their homes and levying a tribute on everything the farmer buys, or that the average householder buys, from the swaddling clothes of infancy to the lining of the coffin in which old age is laid away. He does not mind even going beyond the grave, and levying a tariff on the humble tombstone that marks the last resting place of the vanishing farmers of Missouri and other States; but when it comes to getting the information for the purpose of statistics, or to help improve living conditions, the gentleman rises and in a speech—which I hope he will temper down for the sake of decency before he puts it into the RECORD—and uses Mr. Harry Hopkins as a sounding board in order to stir up prejudice against the provision, not in this bill, but in one of the questionnaires sent out to the enumerators and presented to the people of every State, including Missouri.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield to a question from the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICH. Did the gentleman vote last week to permit agricultural products to come into this country to take the place of the products of the American farmer? Did the gentleman vote last week to prevent manufactured products coming in here from foreign countries?

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, I decline to yield further.

Mr. RICH. Did the gentleman vote for those things?

Mr. RANKIN. I decline to yield further to this manufacturing magnate from Pennsylvania, who is now manifesting synthetic sympathy for the farmers. He does not care anything about the farmers of Missouri.

Mr. MOTT rose.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oregon to see if he has anything better to offer.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman recalls that I supported rural electrification.

Mr. RANKIN. I congratulate the gentleman from Oregon. That was the most just vote he has cast since he has been in Congress. The gentleman from Oregon did his people as much good by that vote as the gentleman from Pennsylvania would do them harm.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I decline to yield further.

Mr. MOTT. Whether that was the best vote I ever cast is a matter of opinion, but the gentleman has referred a number of times to Republican opposition to rural-electrification legislation.

Now, this is my question. I want to know if the gentleman knows of any Republicans who opposed that. I did not.

Mr. RANKIN. I will call the roll for you before this Congress is over.

Mr. MOTT. I wish you would. I think the Republicans generally supported that.

Mr. RANKIN. I will say to the gentleman from Oregon that had we waited for the Republicans to create either the T. V. A. or the Rural Electrification Administration this generation of farmers would have died without ever having electric lights in their homes.

Mr. MOTT. I admit that we may not be so hot for the T. V. A., but we did support the rural electrification.

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, the gentleman voted for my amendment for $100,000,000 for rural electrification, which has lighted hundreds of thousands of farm homes that would otherwise be in darkness now. I give him credit for that. But if we had waited for the Republican administration, such as we had from 1921 to 1933, to create the Rural Electrification Administration to take electricity to the millions of farms in this country, this generation of farmers would have died and their children probably would have died without ever having seen electricity in their homes.

Mr. MOTT. But the gentleman is in error when he says the Republicans generally opposed it.

Mr. RANKIN. I did not say that. I said you did not create it, but I will show that a majority of the Republicans now in the House have never voted for rural electrification on a roll call.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. DINGELL. And I assume in many instances that these votes were cast right because you agreed to give them a Grand Coulee in their back yard.

Mr. MOTT. Let me inform the gentleman from Michigan that Grand Coulee is not in my back yard nor in the back yard of any Member from the State of Oregon.

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, I am not accusing the gentleman from Oregon of voting for it on that ground. I take it he voted for it conscientiously. You have a semblance of righteousness over on that side once in a while; that is, some of you. It never does take in the whole party at once, however.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I thought the gentleman was going to speak on Wednesday.

Mr. RICH. I am; but I want to ask you a question. Do you know that all the things you are doing and have done in this administration, every dollar of it is yet to be paid for by these children you are lauding so much; and how are they going to get the money to pay for them, when you borrow the money from them and expect them to pay the bill? How are they going to do it? They will not laud you for burdening them so terribly heavy in financial debt; I am afraid an unbearable debt.

Mr. RANKIN. Why, that is the easiest question to answer that the gentleman his ever asked. I will tell you how.

The people of Pennsylvania are overcharged $76,000,000 for electricity now, and the gentleman's district is one of the worst overcharged in the State. By getting electricity to these people at what it is worth, the difference between what they would have paid under the old system and what they are paying now will pay for every dollar that is invested in these rural power lines. The T. V. A. is paying for itself every year. Already it has reduced rates $583,000,000 a year throughout the country. Every one of you is getting the benefit of it and the people are for it.

You have taken hold of a live wire and we are not going to let you turn it loose. You have to blindfold the Republican elephant now to get him near an electric light. When you go out against this program, you seal the doom of every man who goes to the people and talks that language, especially with the farmers who are crying out for rural electrification.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this attack on the Census Bureau is nothing in the world but camouflage. I looked into this question and I made a statement on the floor when it first came up. This is nothing in God's world but an attempt to muddy the water—to stir up prejudice against the Census Bureau, which is doing one of the greatest works of any bureau of the Government—compiling statistics that will be of benefit to the American people for years to come.

I do not blame you Republicans for not wanting your people to know how many of the ones you represent do not have electricity or refrigerators or electric irons in their homes. In the average State the saturation for electric refrigerators is 48 percent. In my town of Tupelo, Miss., it is 90 percent. I do not blame you; this information would embarrass you greatly if it informed your people how deficient they are in the use of these and other appliances that go to make home life more pleasant and more attractive.

I do not blame you for not wanting every merchant in your town to know how he is being robbed with exorbitant light and power rates and denied the use of those appliances that would add to the efficiency and the profits of his business. I do not blame you for not wanting your manufacturers to know of the millions of dollars of overcharges they are paying for electricity. The truth may stir riots in your districts.

No wonder you are fighting this provision to keep the American people from getting the truth, and the whole truth. It is to your interests, politically, to keep them in the dark. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BREWSTER].

NEW ENGLAND OBJECTS

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Chairman, I did not hear that the immediate question of the census was particularly discussed by the gentleman who immediately preceded me. I think we feel perhaps more strongly in New England on this matter than almost anywhere else. Although I will not say that in other sections they do not have equal pride of their personal privileges and prerogatives. At any rate, I know that in New England the inquisitorial character of this new census is bitterly resented. It is unfortunate in this period when we have so many pressing problems this should be added. I take it the vote upon this issue will be rather symbolic of the sentiment regarding certain other questions in this census which are not immediately involved but are collaterally related—questions regarding income and other things in this inquisition regarding the personal affairs of so many of our people.

SELF-RESPECT

In our section in spite of the tragic difficulties of recent years there is still pride in their traditional independence. No matter how bitterly they may have suffered from the depression they keep up at least some semblance of their ancient self-respect. And now to be compelled to answer these questions to men who are not always the most responsible in the community seems to me extremely unfortunate.

ECONOMY

But above and beyond that personal aspect which I think is typical of the old spirit of New England, of the Declaration of Independence, and of the fight that was then made for personal liberty, is the economy phase. As I understand from the testimony of the Bureau before the committee this will add 40 to 75 percent to the cost of taking the census. I do not believe that any result which can possibly be achieved—the information that it will add to that which is already available—can possibly justify this tremendous additional expense in this period when we are all seeking to hold down as well as we can the expenditures of the Government.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BREWSTER. I yield.

SAVE $8,000,000

Mr. SHORT. And to get this additional information at this time will cost an extra $8,000,000 at a time when we are spending $2 for every $1 we take in. This is no time to do it.

Mr. BREWSTER. This issue may serve as an excellent test of the real devotion of Congress not only to the spirit of economy but also to the American tradition of individual liberty and privacy. I hope the same spirit still burns in other sections that flamed when the South rallied to our assistance at Bunker Hill. I hope you will join with us in resisting this new excursion into a more highly centralized society. Let us have some semblance of privacy somewhere in the affairs of the people of the United States.

Mr. RANKIN. Did the gentleman from Maine hear the gentleman from South Carolina read the schedule that the Republicans put into the census in the year 1910 under the guise of seeking necessary information but going a great deal further into the privacy of the individual than the present proposed questions do? Evidently the gentleman is not familiar with the record of his own party.

Mr. BREWSTER. The questions then were not under the compulsion of the census. But does the gentleman from Mississippi consider that we are bound by any errors of our ancestors? I do not understand that the gentleman from Mississippi considers himself bound by the opinions even of his current colleagues.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BREWSTER. I yield.

Mr. DONDERO. Did the gentleman from North Carolina tell us that that was an investigation, not a census which was taken under compulsion of fine or imprisonment for failure to answer the questions?

Mr. BREWSTER. I thank the gentleman for his contribution. I take this time simply to record what I believe to be the overwhelming sentiment of New England—that cradle where so many of our liberties were born—against this further excursion toward a totalitarian state.

CENSUS INQUISITION

New England, in my judgment, is militantly opposed to using the census to probe into the most personal and private affairs of individuals and into the conditions under which they live.

Many of these questions seem characteristic of a totalitarian state—not of a free America.

An irresponsible inquisitor could wreak irreparable injury. Many matters not even known to close relatives and friends must be disclosed to a politically selected neighbor who may not always be worthy of the confidence imposed by a far-removed administrator.

An increased distrust of Government must inevitably result in this period when it is of supreme importance by every legitimate means to build among men of good will confidence in the democratic process.

Repeatedly confidential material has been publicly exposed in response to some alleged public interest. A New England Yankee does not like to be a goldfish.

Many a rebel against Government will be made by this unwarranted inquisition at a time when confidence and loyalty are preeminently required if democracy is to survive.

This year also is not the time to increase the cost of the census by 75 percent. After a century and a half without this information this is no time to nearly double the cost of the census in order to disgust people with their Government.

Five million dollars can here easily be saved and the people of New England and I believe the country will almost universally applaud. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 6 minutes.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, the discussion this afternoon has been the most encouraging discussion I believe that we have had on this side of the aisle for many days. It constitutes the first admission I have heard for a long time from the leaders of the New Deal that thus far they have failed to secure the information they promised to secure 8 years ago.

As I listened to my distinguished friend from Mississippi, for whom I have a very high regard, and to my friend from Washington, I could reach no other conclusion than that for 8 years they have been groping in the dark.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, this is the first census we have taken since this administration came into power.

Mr. DITTER. They have been groping in the dark as to where the need is in America. Now they come and say they know only one thing, that there is a need and they want the means provided by the Federal Government to ascertain where the need is. This, it seems to me, is a most deplorable situation, to feel that after all the money that has been spent by this outfit during the last 8 years they are unacquainted entirely with where the real need is and that as the curtain comes down on the New Deal regime now they say, "We want to know where the people are who are in need."

I recall that some years ago the declaration was made that one-third of the people were ill-clad, ill-housed, and ill-fed. Now my distinguished friend from Mississippi defies us and says that he does not wonder that we want to withhold from the people whether they have refrigerators or not. I answer the gentleman by saying that I am more concerned about getting refrigerators into those homes than I am with these experimental efforts he is advocating to ascertain whether they have refrigerators. Instead of so many of these social uplifters, instead of so many of these social experiments, why not get to work and find out how many of our people who really want refrigerators have the chance to earn the dollar with which to buy the refrigerators?

That is what we need. [Applause.] I say to my friend, who delights in taunting Pennsylvania, who delights in taunting my colleague from Pennsylvania for being a manufacturer's representative, that the State of Pennsylvania has in no small measure provided the nucleus financially by which the State of Mississippi has benefited from those things which it presently enjoys. So instead of charging the State of Pennsylvania because it has power interests, because of the fact it has some financial stability, because of the fact it has the self-reliance to stand on its own strength rather than depend upon the paternalism and the bounties and the goodness of other States, I say to the gentleman from Mississippi that he might well go back to Mississippi and try to stir the State of Mississippi with that forensic ability he has that they go to work and get jobs, that they go to work and provide for themselves these refrigerators and electrification. The State of Pennsylvania is willing to stand on the record it has established and on the contribution it has made, not only for its own people but for the people of the State of Mississippi who today benefit by the self reliance, the frugality, the individualism, the industry, the initiative, and those things that go to make up a real worth-while spirit of Americanism.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DITTER. I referred to the gentleman, and I certainly yield to him.

Mr. RANKIN. The truth about the matter is this: The reason the people of Pennsylvania cannot use refrigerators is because the Power Trust robs them by charging such exorbitant rates for electricity that they cannot afford to use them.

Mr. DITTER. Now, I did not yield to the gentleman for a speech. May I answer the gentleman that in my opinion the gentleman has one obsession and we have heard that obsession of his about the Power Trust for a long time. We have heard the charges he has made against every State that has the spirit of free enterprise, which is still worth while. May I invite the gentleman to come into the State of Pennsylvania, and may I invite him particularly to come into my district, and I say to him that we are prouder by far of the spirit of free enterprise that has been at the foundation of our own effort in Pennsylvania; we are prouder by far of that spirit than the spirit which the gentleman continually feels is the only thing upon which he can claim the right to demand the attention of the House.

Pennsylvania has carried its share of the paternalism of the New Deal. It compares favorably with the contribution coming from the State of Mississippi. Pennsylvania, with a farm valuation—land and buildings of $925,476,000—received benefit payments of only $16,629,186. In other words the farmers of Pennsylvania received an amount of benefit payments equal to about only 1.68 percent of their land value. Now let us look at Mississippi. That State with a farm valuation of $436,151,000 received agricultural-adjustment benefits of $104,011,811, that is, the farmers of Mississippi received in benefit payments an amount equal to about 23 percent of the total value of their farms.

Again may I point out that Farm Credit Administration loans outstanding in Mississippi as of December 31, 1939, amounted to $44,452,589. This represents more than 10 percent of the farm-land valuation of that State. The figures in Pennsylvania are favorable by contrast. As of the same date the outstanding loans in Pennsylvania amounted to $30,593,000, which is only 3.3 percent in round figures of her total valuation of farms. Further comparisons might be made. The total internal-revenue collections per capita and the total grants and expenditures in the States give further evidence that Pennsylvania compares favorably with Mississippi in its contribution to and its assumption of the welfare of the Nation as a whole. The internal-revenue collections in Mississippi, per capita, for the year ending June 30, 1939, were $3.04; Pennsylvania's were $43.11. In that same period Mississippi revenue collections paid to the Federal Government amounted to $6,152,000 while the grants and expenditures to Mississippi were $84,745,000, a nice tidy profit for Mississippi. Let us look at Pennsylvania during that period. Pennsylvania provided $438,672,000 in revenue collections, and received in bounties from the Federal paternalism only $289,351,000, not a profit, but a deficit. Pennsylvania can carry its head high as figures rather than fancy is the measure of comparison with Mississippi.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the remainder of the time on this side.

Mr. RANKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DITTER] jumped on the Southern States about the expenditures for W. P. A., but he overlooked the fact that in the last year there was $214,000,000 spent in Pennsylvania and only $211,000,000 in all the Southern States. In Pennsylvania that was under a Republican administration and in a State in which they have about the highest electric light and power rates in the Union, and about the fewest refrigerators per capita.

Mr. DITTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Briefly.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Mississippi will examine into the entire record of the State of Mississippi and compare it with the record of Pennsylvania, I think he will blush in shame at the comparison between the two States.

Mr. RANKIN. When I realize how my Government has permitted the tariff barons of the State of Pennsylvania to rob the farmers of other States, through high protective tariffs, I do blush in shame. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, what promised to be a rather routine and dull afternoon has turned out to be somewhat enlivened, and I hope it will afford some enjoyment to the galleries and perhaps enlightment to those who would like to have some intelligent information on this item.

The question whether or not there should be a housing census and when it should have been taken is a matter about which there might be an honest difference of opinion. There may be a good deal of merit in the statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the housing census would have helped more if we had taken it before making all of these large expenditures; but let me call your attention to the fact that in the time of emergency, when the Home Owners' Loan Corporation was set up, when the slum-clearance projects were being set up, when the Federal Housing Administration was being set up, the Congress almost unanimously voted to support programs of that kind, because it felt there was an emergency. I know of a great many people who are still being called upon to appropriate large sums of money for further programs of this kind. It seems there should be some real authentic information given as to just what the situation is with reference to housing in this country. So far as I am concerned, I think this housing census should be taken as a part of the population census and if it is we will save a lot of money. The Congress voted to have the housing census taken, and as late as February 8 in this very Chamber, on a direct motion offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] to take the housing money out of the Commerce bill to prevent any funds being used for that purpose, 134 Members voted to take the money out and prevent the housing census and 211 voted to continue with the housing census. Therefore there is nothing left, as the matter stands. The Congress has definitely decided there shall be a housing census and that it shall be taken now. The Appropriations Committee, under these circumstances, brings in the amount of money which Congress has authorized.

I want to keep the record a little bit straight when some of my friends on the minority side wax eloquent in their defense of the sanctities of the American home and the liberty of American citizens, and inveigh against these inquisitors knocking at the door, asking embarrassing questions. You would think this is the first time there had been an inquiry of that kind in the United States, but this is not the first time that has happened. Of course, the American home should be protected. No one will argue on that score.

No questions of a personal nature should be asked, nor embarrassing questions. But let us look at the record for a moment, just in order that the idea may not go out to the country that the terrible party in power is the first one that ever rang the doorbell of an American home and asked a personal question of the landlord.

In 1907 under the administration of Mr. Theodore Roosevelt, with a Republican Congress, it became advisable to find out something about the conditions of the women and children in industry, and the Congress passed an act stating:

> That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to investigate and report on the industrial, social, moral, educational, and physical condition of woman and child workers in the United States wherever employed, with special reference to their age, hours of labor, term of employment, health, illiteracy, sanitary, and other conditions surrounding their occupation, and the means employed for the protection of their health, persons, and morals.

A very laudable, a very worthy, and a very justifiable inquiry.

The President and the Congress wanted authentic information on the subject in order to know whether or not it would be in order or proper to have remedial legislation, and if so, what kind of legislation it should be. They went ahead with that investigation and the Commissioner of Labor went out and had his questionnaires distributed. They were brought back and filed with the Congress in 1911 under the administration of President Taft and a Republican Congress. The volume may be obtained in the Library. It is entitled "Report of the Commissioner of Labor, 1910, on the Condition of Woman and Child Wage Earners in the United States," volume XVI, and so forth.

I want to read you several of the schedules—and these are not just questions that they proposed to ask, because in this instance they brought the schedules back and published them in the records. These are not only questions they proposed to ask, but here are the answers as well as the questions.

Mr. Chairman, I am not criticizing what was done by the Republican Congress and the Republican President. Indeed, I believe it was justifiable and worthy. They wanted to know the condition of these people who were asking for help. Every day they were knocking on the doors of this Congress asking for large public-building programs, for slum clearing and housing, and for this, that, and the other. I, for one, would like to have some authentic information on the subject, and that is what they wanted in those days. What did they ask the people?

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Yes; briefly.

Mr. HOOK. Can the gentleman explain to us whether or not he has any information with regard to the use to which the information obtained at that time was put?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. It was filed in the archives of the Government, as far as I know. I do not know.

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. KITCHENS. Does not the gentleman realize that certain elements of the Republican Party are trying to reform the party today to get away from some of the things that took place in former years?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I do not want to get into the partisan side of this question. I want to show, if I can, that this is not any outrageous, unheard-of inquiry that is proposed. In this schedule they asked each one of these workers what their income was, what they did with the money, what it bought, what kind of food they had, what they had for their meals, and so forth. They asked about the menu of the family, and this is what family No. 3 told the inquirer they had for breakfast: Beef hash, biscuit, sirup and butter, coffee and Postum, sugar and milk. For dinner they had beef hash, biscuit, and corn bread. For supper they had warmed-over beef hash, biscuit, corn bread, and buttermilk.

I want to say to my distinguished friend from New York, who is so much concerned about the liberties of the country and the sanctity of the home, that they asked the ladies a few questions. They asked the housewife of family No. 3 about the clothing of the family, and these answers refer to a daughter, age 12.

They asked her how many coats she had, and she said she had one coat, cloth, value $3. "How many dresses?" Five dresses, gingham, value $3.10. Two dresses, $2.10. One dress, $2.75. Four petticoats, cotton, $1.84. Four drawers, cotton, 28 cents. I am told by some of my older colleagues that that used to be an article of wearing apparel of the gentler sex. [Laughter.] Three winter underwear, canton flannel, 90 cents. Two nightgowns, cotton, 70 cents. One hat, felt, $1.50. One hat, straw, $1. Twenty stockings, $2. Four shoes, $6. Total, $25.17 worth of clothing that girl had.

They ask in here what kind of toilet conditions existed in their homes and in the places they worked.

Mr. MARSHALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. MARSHALL. Was that in a census inquiry?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. No; this was a special inquiry.

Mr. MARSHALL. Was anyone required to go to jail if he refused to answer those questions?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Well, as far as going to jail was concerned, nobody has ever gone to jail.

Mr. MARSHALL. Was it compulsory that those answers be made?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. If it is merely a question of whether you go to jail or not, it would be very easy to write in this bill a provision, if Congress wished to do so, that a jail sentence should not be imposed. But that is not the question that has been raised here.

Mr. MARSHALL. This was not a census inquiry at all, it was a survey?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. It was a special inquiry.

Mr. MARSHALL. It was only a survey, that is all it was?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MARSHALL. Anybody could answer if he wanted to. They did not ask everybody in the United States these questions, either.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. You can name it just what you please to name it.

Mr. MARSHALL. They did not ask everybody in the United States those questions.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. No; not everybody in the United States.

Mr. MARSHALL. It was just a cross-section inquiry.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. O'NEAL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. O'NEAL. I would like to ask the gentleman if these questions are any more personal than the investigation or the questions that are asked before W. P. A. assistance is given, before N. Y. A. assistance is given, or before the United States Housing Authority will start erecting buildings in the cities, or before the Federal Land Bank will lend money to the farmers, or before the Home Owners' Loan Corporation will lend money in the cities.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Of course not. It is the same type of inquiry that Congress has laid down many times when it wanted special information and the only way to get it was to ask questions about it.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. DITTER. Do I understand the gentleman is willing to have an amendment written into this bill whereby all penalty provisions, both as to imprisonment and fine, shall be lifted and leave it entirely to the discretion of the American people as to whether these questions shall be answered or not?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania is a distinguished member of the Appropriations Committee and also a member of the committee that handled this appropriation bill, just as the gentleman from Virginia is, and the gentleman from Virginia thinks that an amendment of that kind should be considered in the subcommittee and in the full committee before being brought to the floor of the House. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is a Member of the House and can offer such an amendment, if he wishes to do so, and does not have to get permission from the gentleman from Virginia or anybody else.

Mr. DITTER. I appreciate that gracious compliment from the gentleman, but on the other hand I know the gentleman is intelligent enough and alert enough and that he follows the temper of the House wisely, and if such an amendment from the floor were required, he would be the one who would sponsor it, and since he is the chairman I wonder if the committee can depend upon his support for such an amendment.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. The gentleman does not usually depend upon the gentleman from Virginia when he wants things done. The gentleman is quite capable of doing them himself.

Mr. O'NEAL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. O'NEAL. I would just like to state that when the legislative bill authorizing the housing census was passed—without objection, so far as I know, from anyone—section 2 was included, which states:

> All of the provisions, including penalties, of the act providing for the fifteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, approved June 18, 1929, shall apply to the taking of the census provided for in section 1 of this act.

If they do not want such a census taken, they should repeal that portion of the legislative act dealing with a housing census.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. POAGE. It has been suggested here that in the special inquiry the questions the gentleman has referred to as having been put out in 1908 were not asked of everyone in the United States. As a matter of fact, they were questions propounded under the authority of a Republican administration to States where it was certain that the Democrats were in a majority, were they not?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. They were questions directed to the workers in Southern States.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. REED of New York. If the parliamentary situation is such that we could remove the penalties and leave it to the discretion of the people, then you would have a housing survey, and I am just wondering if that could not be done. I would like to have the gentleman understand this: I am absolutely sincere, and I know that the others are. I just do not want the Congress to be charged with any such inquisitorial program to which these penalties are attached. If we could eliminate that, I am not so sure but what the reaction would be that the survey would be far more valuable than it is going to be if we press the bill as it is now. I have some respect for this Congress, I will say to the gentleman from Virginia, and I cherish its good name, and I want the public to have confidence in it. I believe we are destroying such confidence by pressing this matter, because the people are certainly aroused over it.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I appreciate the gentleman's observation. The gentleman knows I am just one member of the Appropriations Committee and not a member of the legislative committee that handled the original bill. The matter has been up here time and again, and the Congress has expressed itself upon it a number of times.

Mr. REED of New York. If the gentleman will yield for one more observation, I will be glad to offer such an amendment, but I have not the ingenuity to frame one that would not be subject to a point of order. Perhaps someone else could do it.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I cannot think of anybody who could frame a legislative provision for an appropriation bill that would not be subject to a point of order.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. HARE. Apropos of the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. POAGE] with reference to the special investigation referred to by the gentleman, this investigation was not confined to any particular section, but was carried on in every State of the Union and applied to the entire United States, but they were separated by divisions. I understand further that the law that enabled the enumerators to obtain this information from the individuals or from an industry is no different in principle from the law involved in this particular case, because if the Government has the right to go out and inquire of 100 citizens as to income and living conditions, it has the right to inquire of 1,000 or 10,000 citizens.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. I just want to ask the chairman of the subcommittee if it does not seem strange that the minority should suddenly develop a conscience about penalties on census matters? I suppose it is because there is another party in power. Is not that the reason?

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time and ask that the bill be read for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF ENTOMOLOGY AND PLANT QUARANTINE

Control of incipient and emergency outbreaks of insect pests and plant diseases: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out the provisions of and for expenditures authorized by the joint resolution approved May 9, 1938 (52 Stat. 344), fiscal year 1940, $2,000,000, to remain available until June 30, 1941.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. O'CONNOR: Page 9, line 6, strike out "$2,000,000" and insert "$3,000,000."

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, my proposed amendment is the amount that the Bureau of the Budget had determined necessary to take care of the grasshoppers, Mormon crickets, insects, and other pests that destroy crops. I have in my hand a map which shows the various States that are concerned in this amendment. It will be noticed they are Montana, Wyoming, Nevada, Utah, Idaho, Oregon, Washington, North and South Dakota, Nebraska, Kansas, northern Texas, Minnesota, Wisconsin. All of those States are concerned with this subject. Of the $4,000,000 that are cut off in this bill from the Budget estimates, $1,000,000 is taken from this item. It seems to me that this is a poor policy and a poor place to economize. It might be that by expending a little more money several million dollars in crops would be saved and several thousand people as a result would be kept from going on relief. This Bureau may be trusted with funds. It has on hand now, according to the chairman of this committee, something like $400,000. That shows that no money is spent that is not necessary. The grasshoppers may suddenly come. Then it takes action to take care of them. Congress may not be in session at such time, or if it is in session it would take time to get through an emergency bill. It is safe to have this sum of money placed in the hands of this Bureau in the event it is necessary to use it. I have a chart here in my hand which shows the results of the control that has been operated by the Bureau of Entomology beginning: The percentage of saving in potential loss was 25 percent in 1933; in 1935 the control increased the percentage of saving from potential loss to 60 percent; in 1938 it was increased to 67 percent by control; and in 1939 it was increased to 72 percent. I received the following telegram from the county commissioners in Fort Benton, Mont.:

FORT BENTON, MONT.

Hon. J. F. O'CONNOR,
Washington, D. C.:

County Commissioners and Planning Committee of Liberty, Hill, Blaine, Phillips, Chouteau, Fergus, Pondera, and Cascade Counties, in meeting at Fort Benton today, realizing the seriousness of the grasshopper situation in our counties and inability as communities or counties to meet the situation, do ask your support in directing the Federal Government to aid in the expense of bait-material purchases, and putting all the idle and Government-owned lands in assistance to farmers cooperating in the campaign. We thank you for your past assistance in this connection, but must have this additional help.

M. G. THORPE,
Chairman, Planning Committee.

Bear in mind this: Of every State infested with these grasshoppers, a large portion is owned by the Federal Government. As I told the Committee this morning, one-third of my own State is owned by the United States Goverment, and it is up to the United States Government to take care of the grasshopper situation on these lands, because the farmers cannot do it. The grasshoppers may be propagated on the Government land and get over onto the privately owned land.

The following letter from the Bureau of Entomology from Bozeman, Mont., is pertinent:

Hon. JAMES F. O'CONNOR,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. O'CONNOR: I believe you will be interested in the insect-control situation in our State as it stands now. You will recall that in 1938 we received an immense population of grasshoppers from the Dakotas, which migration laid eggs that fall in east-central Montana. The hoppers hatched out in excessive numbers in that area, and one of the most intensive campaigns in many years reduced the intensity of the flights which occurred. The flights were toward the north and west mainly, and large numbers of eggs were laid by these migrating grasshoppers in Liberty, Hill, Blaine, Phillips, Fergus, Chouteau, eastern Teton, and Pondera counties. In some places the condition will be extremely critical in these counties next year, provided, of course, that natural conditions do not destroy the most of them. The large area in Eastern Montana which was so badly infected this spring will have very few grasshoppers in it.

It is our feeling that it is unfortunate to have to request each year Federal assistance in the control of insects with highly migratory tendencies, and which may involve several States. It would be much easier to plan control work, and I am sure that it would be much less worry to you, if this fund could be put on a permament basis. I do not know how this could be done, but I believe that you will agree with me as to its advisability.

I wish to thank you for your sincere interest and fine cooperation in matters of insect control.

Very truly yours,

HARLOW B. MILLS,
State Entomologist.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Montana has expired.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope the amendment will be agreed to. [Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 2 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the Bureau of the Budget sent an estimate for $3,000,000 for this item for the next fiscal year. The committee went into the matter carefully. We found they have on hand $400,000 unexpended, a carry-over from last year. With the amount granted by the committee that will give them $2,400,000 for the next year. All of the evidence showed that there was no reason to expect the infestation to be nearly so bad this year as in former years, due to the very severe cold winter weather obtaining in that part of the country. All of the experts say that cold weather has the effect of decreasing the propagation of these insects. We feel sure that this amount will be ample to take care of this item. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Montana.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For an additional amount to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of sections 7 to 17, inclusive, of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act, approved February 29, 1936 (16 U. S. C. 590g–590q), and the provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 (52 Stat. 31–70) (except the making of payments pursuant to sections 303 and 381 and the provisions of titles IV and V), fiscal year 1940, including the same purposes and under the same limitations specified under this head in the Department of Agriculture Appropriation Act, 1940, $60,000,000.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I want to speak regarding the $60,000,000 that is not in the printed bill, but is in this section dealing with agriculture, making it available for the overpayments on soil conservation.

They say they have a Budget estimate. I raise the question of whether the President, in the Caribbean Sea, by radio, can wire this House, and make that a Budget estimate. I am not opposed to this appropriation, but we have been very punctilious about what constitutes a Budget estimate. The Budget law says it shall be with his signature and accompanied by reasons. We have before insisted on the John Hancock paper as provided by law. The President is not where he can function as President of the United States, and we do not have a legal Budget estimate.

What I want to emphasize is this: That this $60,000,000 that they are going to give to make up for overpayments for soil conservation, or because they have more compliance than they figured, is to be taken out of the $500,000,000 for next year's appropriation. This is to pay the 1939 compliance. They have to reduce the percentage to the complier for next year in borrowing this from the next year's appropriation. The Secretary admitted that. The point is we are going to push this up and treat them all alike now. They could all be paid without any action here, in July or August.

Now, the point is we are trying to please the farmers now. We do not care if he takes a reduced ratio next year, after election, but we are very anxious that all compliers be paid in full now, this year. They are admitting, if they take it out of the proposed $500,000,000, for next year, that they will all have to take a reduced ratio to stay within the $440,000,000 next year. I am just giving this to you for what it is worth. I think we ought to reduce the size of the payments some way. If the Senate would limit all payments to $400 to any individual there would not have to be any reduction in the ratio. Ninety-three percent of the compliers in 1939 got less than $200 each. We ought to take it off of the big payees.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I yield.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Is it not a fact that we pay off half of our farmers with less than $50,000,000 which is the amount to be paid for administering this $500,000,000 item?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Yes.

Mr. REES of Kansas. In other words, we pay for administering to the farmers as much money as we pay one-half of our farmers?

Mr. LAMBERTSON. I think you are right. Ninety-three percent of the farmers get less than $200 each out of this $500,000,000 appropriation. You see what a small percentage would be affected by limiting the payments to three or four hundred dollars.

I just want to call your attention to how anxious they are to see that everybody is pleased now rather than next year, when they admit they are willing to reduce their percentage.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment for the purpose of calling attention to certain parts of the hearings and for the purpose of asking the chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations for the Department of Agriculture a question.

On page 307 of the hearings I read as follows:

Mr. CANNON. If we agree to this, the Senate will take it out; but, as the Secretary says, all they are asking is that the money be made available sooner, and then the Senate, instead of appropriating $500,000,000, will only appropriate $440,000,000.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Will they take out the $60,000,000?

Mr. CANNON. They say they will. We would want definite assurance of that. Would we have that assurance from you, Mr. Secretary, that you would expect the amount to be reduced from $500,000,000 to $440,000,000?

Secretary WALLACE. Yes.

Now, I would like to ask the chairman of the Department of Agriculture subcommittee if he has assurance from members of the Senate Appropriations Committee that this $60,000,000 will be taken out of the pending agricultural appropriation bill for 1941?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, in response to the inquiry of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER], there is no purpose to increase the appropriation for the pending year. It is merely intended to make the money available for emergency purposes and to reduce by the same amount the appropriation for this purpose carried in the agricultural appropriation bill which has already gone to the Senate. It is necessary to have the money in time for the farmer to make his plans and crop adjustments for the year and in time for the county committees to meet and make their allotments.

This action is necessary because of the unexpected compliance on the part of the farmers with the farm program—a rather significant situation. The farm program has met such general favor throughout the country that the surplus which has always remained heretofore at the end of the fiscal year has been exhausted, and additional funds must be provided to carry on the program.

So far as assurance of the reduction in the $500,000,000 carried in the agricultural appropriation bill is concerned, representatives of the Committee on Agriculture and the Subcommittee on Agriculture of the Committee on Appropriations met with representatives of similar committees of the Senate, and it was agreed that if this amount was provided now in the deficiency bill a similar amount would be taken out of the agricultural bill in the Senate.

The Budget estimate is as follows:

FEBRUARY 25, 1940.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith for the consideration of Congress a supplemental estimate of appropriation for conservation and use of agricultural land resources, Department of Agriculture, fiscal year 1940, in the sum of $60,000,000, with my recommendation that a fully offsetting decrease be made in the estimate submitted under this head in the Budget for the fiscal year 1941.

The details of this supplemental estimate of appropriation, the necessity therefor, and the reasons for its transmission at this time, as well as the basis of the offsetting reduction in the 1941 estimate under this head, are set forth in the letter of the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, transmitted herewith, with whose comments and observations I concur.

Respectfully,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

FEBRUARY 20, 1940.

SIR: I have the honor to submit herewith for your consideration a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the Department of Agriculture, fiscal year 1940, for conservation and use of agricultural land resources, with proposed fully offsetting reduction in the estimate submitted under this head in the Budget for the fiscal year 1941, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Conservation and use of agricultural land resources, Department of Agriculture—

For an additional amount to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of sections 7 to 17, inclusive, of the Soil Conservation and Domestic Allotment Act, approved Feb. 29, 1936, as amended (16 U. S. C. 590g–590q) and the provisions of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, as amended (7 U. S. C. 1281–1407) (except the making of payments pursuant to sections 303 and 381 and the provisions of titles IV and V), fiscal year 1940, including the same purposes and objects, and under the same limitations specified under this head in the Department of Agriculture Appropriation Act, 1940 (53 Stat. 973–974) $60,000,000

In the event the supplemental 1940 appropriation proposed in the foregoing is made available, the estimate under this head in the Budget for the fiscal year 1941 (p. 372), should be amended to substitute for the figures "$498,560,000," the figures "$438,560,000," and further amended by omitting from the language of the estimate the second proviso which reads:

"Provided further, That $30,000,000 of this appropriation shall be immediately available to reimburse the appropriation under this head for 1940 on account of obligations created against said appropriation in connection with the 1940 grants-of-aid program, advances for the 1940 crop-insurance program, and county association expenses for the 1940 agricultural-conservation program."

It is found that of the funds made available in the 1940 appropriation under this head, approximately $36,000,000 must be expended for the 1940 grants-of-aid program, advances for the 1940 crop-insurance program, and county association activities in connection with the 1940 agricultural-conservation program, and that $24,000,000 in addition to the above amount will be required to complete all payments due to farmers for compliance with the 1939 agricultural-conservation program.

In order that farmers may have a basis for deciding whether to participate in the agricultural-conservation program, the rates of payment are announced before the beginning of each calendar year. Approximately 5,800,000 farmers participated in the 1939 program, a number greatly beyond Department anticipations. The Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 also included provision for upward adjustment of payments under $200. No accurate information as to the amount required to make these adjustments was available until late in 1939, and it is now determined that needs on this account materially exceed the Department's advance estimates. Rate reductions ordered in August 1939 when the foregoing factors began to be apparent have proved inadequate.

The supplemental estimate herein is designed to provide without delay the additional funds necessary to meet 1939 program commitments. It is recommended for approval only with the understanding that the rates of payment in connection with the 1940 program will be so adjusted by administrative action under the authority of existing law as to insure the completion of this year's program with the $36,000,000 contemplated by the supplemental estimate herein plus the reduced 1941 Budget estimate of $438,560,000.

It is pointed out that the necessity for using $30,000,000 to $40,000,000 of the funds appropriated each year for grants of aid, advances for crop insurance, and county-association expenses, all in connection with the program of the next ensuing crop year is annually recurrent. This situation could be met at the cost of some delay in final payments each year by including in the language of each annual appropriation act a proviso similar to the "second proviso" recommended herein for elimination from the estimate for the fiscal year 1941. To keep the agricultural conservation program strictly within the limits of a direct annual appropriation of $500,000,000, however, rates of payment should be so reduced as to provide these funds for advance expenses within each year's appropriation without such proviso, and it is proposed that the Secretary of Agriculture make such further adjustments in the rates of payment for 1940, 1941, and 1942 as will eliminate the need for such a proviso or other form of supplemental appropriation subsequent to the fiscal year 1942.

The foregoing supplemental estimate of appropriation for the fiscal year 1940 and the proposed offsetting reduction in the Budget estimates for the fiscal year 1941 are required to meet a contingency which has arisen since the submission of the Budgets for the fiscal years 1940 and 1941. I recommend transmission to Congress.

Very respectfully,

JOHN B. BLANDFORD, Jr.
Acting Director of the Bureau of the Budget.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. In response to the gentleman from Kansas relative to the decrease in the amount of benefits to be paid to the farmers under this act, of the $60,000,000, $36,000,000 will be used for three purposes: First, to advance money to farmers for the purchase of fertilizer, lime, and so forth, which will be repaid by the farmers receiving it from their soil-conservation checks. Second, the premiums for crop insurance must be advanced to farmers who are not in position to pay it in cash, and the amounts so advanced will later be taken out of their checks. Third, the expenses of the county committees will be advanced in order to permit them to meet and provide for compliance in their respective counties. All of these amounts will be paid back, and there is no possibility of a dollar of it being diverted.

The only amount that is not reimbursable is the $17,000,000 necessary to carry out the new law passed at the last session to provide special benefits for the small farmers. The law was deficient in its applications to the farmers with small acreage, and this $17,000,000 will equalize their benefits and cannot be refunded. Also the deficiency of approximately $7,000,000 in overhead. But these amounts are negligible in proportion to the $500,000,000 involved and, according to the testimony of the Secretary of Agriculture, will not exceed 4 percent of the 1941 program.

I will say, however, that if the gentleman from Kansas is particularly solicitous about even this amount he may offer an amendment appropriating the additional $24,000,000. I think he would find very substantial support for such an amendment on both sides of the aisle.

Mr. LAMBERTSON. How can I offer an amendment to put a limitation on a bill that is over in the Senate?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The gentleman can offer an amendment providing $24,000,000 additional for soil conservation and I shall be glad to support it most heartily.

By unanimous consent, the pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Expenses of the Sixteenth Census: For an additional amount for beginning the work of taking, compiling, and publishing the Sixteenth Census of the United States, fiscal year 1940, including the same objects specified under this head in the Department of Commerce Appropriation Act, 1940, and to carry out the provisions of the act, approved August 11, 1939 (53 Stat. 1406), directing the taking of a census of housing as a part of the population inquiry of the sixteenth decennial census, $5,000,000, to remain available until June 30, 1941.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. REED of New York: On page 9, beginning in line 15, strike out all down to and including line 2, on page 10.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, this is the only parliamentary approach that I have been able to figure out to stop this proposed snooping census. I have a twofold purpose in this. In the first place, I want to save the Congress from the criticism that is going to come down upon it from the people of this country if it approves the type of questions proposed to be propounded by Harry Hopkins through his 120,000 investigators, or whatever you may choose to call them. If it were possible for me to eliminate the criminal features of this bill, I would approach it from that angle, but it stands now that the American people are to be branded as criminals unless they reveal the innermost secrets of their hearts and permit every cubbyhole of their houses to be explored and whatever is found to be reduced to writing, to be filed with the Government. I say that the people resent it. They resent it deeply.

It was intimated on the floor of the House that we are playing politics with this. If I were playing politics with it, or if any other Republican Member of the House were playing politics with it, I would say just let this thing go on until you get the reaction from asking these housing census questions. It is not political. The press does not consider it political. The New York Times, which has always been a loyal Democratic paper and always goes along with your party just so far as it possibly can and still preserve its self-respect, is opposed to the snooping program. [Laughter.] You ought to read the article appearing in the paper written by Mr. Krock and then see the reaction coming through the mail as a result of those articles.

I am trying to save Congress from itself. You defeated the Housing Act, which, some estimated, would cost this country all the way from $800,000,000 to $1,000,000,000. Bear in mind that the census of housing was predicated upon passage of the housing bill you defeated. Three days after the housing bill was defeated the census of housing bill came along and was approved without very much debate. Why? Because it never occurred to you that when you delegated a little discretion to the head of the Commerce Department that he would formulate the type of questions by which he plans to pry into the intimate affairs of the people of this country. It can serve no useful purpose, and here and now we can save $5,000,000 and stop this whole snooping program.

The great majority of the people, the overwhelming majority of the people of this country are law-abiding; they love their Government, but in this day when totalitarian governments are arising everywhere, when we hear one of the dictators proclaim to the world that the putrid corpse of liberty has been buried and his people cheer this sentiment, our own liberty-loving people are beginning to be jealous of any invasion of their rights. They have no one to whom they can turn except their own duly elected Representatives to save them from the tendency toward centralized totalitarian power.

Mr. SHORT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SHORT. Does not the gentleman feel that some of these questions, particularly those relating to the housing situation, is an unjustifiable duplication? Do we not already have much of that data? Of course, if the Government is going to make a loan to some individual or corporation to build a housing project, they should naturally have all this information, but that does not justify the Government forcing everybody in the country to answer these questions. There are thousands of people who do not want loans, and they should not be forced to tell all about their business.

Mr. REED of New York. Certainly not. I know that you Democratic Members of the House realize that the head of the Commerce Department has gone too far. I know the head of the Department of Commerce will not eliminate those questions unless you let him know by your act here that you object to them.

Mr. LEAVY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. LEAVY. Will the gentleman point out to the membership any one of the 33 questions appearing on pages 124, 125, and 126 of the hearings that violates anybody's constitutional rights? I think the gentleman ought to do that in fairness when he makes a blanket charge.

Mr. REED of New York. When you couple with those questions a fine and a jail sentence, or both, when you go to law-abiding citizens on a survey with criminal penalties attached, I say that every one of the questions is an invasion of the privacy of the home.

In answer to your cry of "politics," let me quote what Mr. Arthur Krock, of your Democratic New York Times, has to say with reference to this snooping census, and the outcries against it:

This attitude is based on belief and experience, recently much intensified, that the Government is a poor keeper of confidences and that the constitutional guaranty of certain privacies is not sacred in Washington. In proof of this, memory need revert no further than the unlawful seizure and publication of private correspondence by Justice (then Senator) Black, and the periodic issuance of Executive orders by the President to open to public inspection information gathered by the Government on a confidential basis.

Also, this is an intensely political administration; the census enumerators were chosen in large part on the request of politicians; and some of the information they have been instructed to obtain from citizens would be very useful in arranging for that planned society which is the goal of many new dealers of the inner circle.

The first few questions in the census schedule are harmless and legitimate. * * * But in the midst of these are two inquiries which no citizen should be compelled to answer on pain of fine, imprisonment, or both: "Value of home, if owned, or monthly rental"; "color or race." It is conceivable that a political machine or an envious neighbor could make improper use of the first. And since anthropologists are far from a unit on how to define races except by the color standard, why demand that, for example, a citizen of mixed ancestry (which means nearly everybody) should give an assured answer? Color anyone ordinarily can see.

"Then come questions 32 and 33, which would throw open to the enumerator who rings the door bell—who might be a neighbor, the servant of a corrupt local political machine, or a total unknown—personal facts wholly private in their nature, according to the American concept. Unless Congress withdraws the question, the citizen must tell "the amount of money, wages or salary received, including commissions," and whether he got an income of $50 from other sources. He must tell these things also with the knowledge that they could easily be passed on to unauthorized persons, twisted to fit a political theory or exposed to the general gaze if high political authority decided to expose them.

THE CENSUS GUINEA PIGS

The citizen whose doorbell is rung may also find that he is one of the special 5 percent guinea pigs of the New Deal. * * * At other periods of American history the jails would have been full of noncresponders if such questions had been put and the penalties invoked. Among the reasons given by the signers for the Declaration of Independence were that King George III had "sent hither swarms of officers to harass our people * * * and tried (us) for pretended offenses." They remarked also that "all men * * * are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights," and that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed." The inalienable right to refuse to answer some of the 1940 census questions might well be conceded in the spirit of that document.

Editorial from the New York Herald Tribune of February 18, 1940:

Somewhere in the Caribbean, escorted by two destroyers, and bound goodness knows where, is the Democratic Party. Its entire future is contained in the brain of one man, the President of the United States. He refuses to divulge his intentions as to a third term to his closest advisers, let alone the leaders of the Democratic Party. He will not even inform the public as to where the Tuscaloosa is going or why.

The whole procedure of the President seems based on the assumption that the American people are movie-struck morons who saw the picture Wings Over the White House and are waiting with palpitating hearts for the Great White Father to decide the world's fate from the deck of a cruiser. Of course, if Mr. Roosevelt wanted to know where the heads of states really met and settled things man to man, he should be directed to Berchtesgaden. Mr. Chamberlain could explain that system very nicely. But the Tuscaloosa and her mystery seem more like items of fun—just clean fun—a good joke on the American people. No boy on a prank could more enjoy surrounding himself in secrecy. But whether he is up to nothing or up to something, the public seems fairly entitled to know which. And the command is still "Hush."

Perhaps the American people have so lost their senses as to vote for continuing the New Deal junket after 1940. But we doubt that they will. A practical people like to know where they are going and why. They like to consult and be consulted; and they are finding it increasingly difficult to cheer for a leader who insists upon fun for himself, however tragic the results may be for the Nation. After 7 years of voyaging hither and yon and arriving exactly nowhere, the touch of solid earth under the foot will feel pleasant indeed.

[Applause.]

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes, 5 minutes to be reserved for the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM]?

There was no objection.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, near the close of the last session of the Congress it passed an act authorizing the taking of a housing census at the regular decennial time for taking the census. The act was passed and an appropriation was made for the regular census.

This is not a deficiency item. It is simply an additional sum of $5,000,000 to take the census authorized by the Congress near the close of the last session. The principal objection to the appropriation seems to be because it makes certain requests for information. It is intimated by the opposition that the Government is inquiring into personal matters that ought not to be looked into and for the reason that if you fail to answer these questions you will be subject to a penalty. These interrogatories are not unlike the interrogatories that have been asked in other censuses of this type or character. You will bear in mind that these answers are private answers and can in no way affect anybody's rights. They will never be known, because the answers are simply kept in the records of the Census Department, and a statute provides that this information cannot be divulged except for statistical purposes. This supplemental housing census cannot be objected to on account of expense, because we are attempting to obviate an expense. It is estimated it will cost as much to take the housing census at this time when we are taking the regular decennial census as it would cost if it were taken at some other time. We are saving about two-thirds the amount it would cost if we took it at another time.

Congress has provided for this census, and it is cheaper to take it now than at another time. The cost will be about one-third by taking it now. The objection made by the proponents of the proposed amendment that it infringes upon your personal rights cannot be, for the simple reason that practically all censuses of this type have contained the same questions. If we are going to take the housing census, now is the time to take it.

A good deal of opposition has been manifested to our housing program. If this is to be a successful program for the country we ought to have certain information about it which will enable us to conduct the program satisfactorily and accomplish what we desire to accomplish by such a program. Now is the time to take this census. It will not only cost less to take it now, but we will acquire information which is essential to the proper functioning of Department of Commerce, Agriculture, Home Loan Bank Board, Federal Housing Administration, United States Housing Authority, and other Government agencies. It will also benefit private business. This appropriation should be made so that we can take this census along with our regular decennial census. Investment in housing represents about one-fourth of our national wealth, yet we badly need reliable statistical information about it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. REES].

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment to strike the additional item of $5,000,000 of expenditure from this bill.

I realize the further expenditure of five million does not seem like very much money the way we appropriate money these days. It means a lot out in my part of the country, especially when it is not necessary. This item of the extra $5,000,000 is in addition to an appropriation of forty million that this Congress has already agreed to spend to take the Federal census. This $40,000,000, I am informed, is ten million more than has heretofore been expended for taking the national census. Now you want to add another five million to take what is known in this bill as a housing census.

Mr. Chairman, let me right here call your attention to the fact that it was only a few months ago a census or survey was taken in every State in the Union. Hundreds of people were employed by the W. P. A. and other agencies to secure the information that you are discussing this afternoon. I do not know what the information is worth, but you have it. As a matter of fact, there are volumes of that information right here in the Congressional Library right across the street. If you do not remember the taking of that census, I am sure the people have not forgotten about it. I just sent for one of the books from the Library, and here it is. It is described as "A Summary of Real Property Inventories Conducted as Work Projects." It says that the work was done under the Works Progress Administration, Division of Social Research. The letter of transmittal is directed to the Honorable Harry L. Hopkins, Director of Works Progress Administration, and is dated August 15, 1938—a little over a year ago. Now, you talk about a housing census. I have not time to read all of it, but let me read just a part of the letter to Mr. Hopkins and which is a part of this book or report. He speaks of the surveys and then says:

> From these surveys has been assembled the most detailed body of statistical information now available on the physical characteristics of housing in the United States. Such information provides the data essential for analysis of various problems connected with real estate and aids the formulation of sound housing programs throughout the country.

It goes on further to say, and I quote:

> The inventories in this report cover more than 8,000,000 dwelling units.

Further:

> The data have sufficiently wide coverage to furnish a general over-all picture of many aspects of urban housing.

It goes on to say that—

> The following kinds of information are included: The type, age, condition, value, mortgage status, the number of rooms, number of persons per room, sanitary facilities, and monthly dwelling units.

It also says it contains information concerning "sanitation and health, such as indoor toilets, bathtubs, central heating," and so forth. Sorry I do not have the time to read more of it to you. The preface says the document and the information were prepared with great care under the direction of the Division of Social Research, as I said before.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us not be confused. This housing census is being taken in addition to the regular census and an additional expense of $5,000,000 added to the $40,000,000 already authorized. If you really want this information, you have it. It is right here in the library and it is of record in the office of the Work Projects Administration. Tell me, anyone of you please, why was all this information compiled? Who asked for it? What are you going to do with it? I will tell you what you are going to do. You are going to throw this information right out of the window, and then spend $5,000,000 of the taxpayers' money to do it all over again. Mr. Chairman, it is not right, and the members of this Committee know it.

Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that my time does not permit, but I do not think it right or fair that a number of the questions contained in the questionnaire should be asked. The amount of your indebtedness is listed; the number of your mortgages; the amounts, the rates of interest, who holds the mortgage, if you are delinquent in your payments; and so forth. It would not make so much difference except that this is not a survey. It is a census and the questions must be answered.

If you are a renter, they ask how much rent you pay and to whom. Now, Mr. Chairman, this House is about to spend this five million to ask these 33 questions in addition to those already listed. That means it will cost about $165,000 for each question. I just do not believe we ought to do it. If you must do it, and again I say it is not necessary, then use a part of the $40,000,000 already appropriated. Use just a little bit of economy.

Mr. Chairman, I can hardly understand from what sources comes the demand for the expenditure of this additional $5,000,000. As I have said you have the information if you really want it. Certainly we are in favor of better housing conditions. This is not the right way to promote better housing in this country.

Why not use a little independent judgment of our own for once and save this $5,000,000. It is unnecessary and is extravagant. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I have heard the several comments this afternoon concerning the Bill of Rights, and the attempts of certain Members to make it appear that this legislation destroys the American Bill of Rights. Our attention has been called to that memorable document as if it were in grave danger. Now, I take second place to no man in this Chamber in my high regard for the Bill of Rights. I have even gone to one of my colleagues lately and gotten several hundred facsimiles of the original draft of the Bill of Rights, first drafted 150 years ago and submitted as 12 amendments to the Constitution, 10 of which were adopted. At the same time that I hand these documents out to patriotic organizations in my State, I say to those patriotic citizens that we need something more than lip service; that it is not nearly so important to memorize the words of those first 10 amendments, or to frame the facsimile and hang it on our assembly walls as it is to know and revere the spirit of it.

I say this simply so that you may see that I am not lacking in respect or veneration for the Bill of Rights, but I wish to state positively that I see no real infringement upon the Bill of Rights in this census legislation. Let me say to my friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED], with whom I dislike to differ, that in these changing times we may have to modify our views of the Bill of Rights—and properly so. For instance, I read in the Bill of Rights that the right to bear arms shall not be infringed. Does that mean we are to let every Tom, Dick, and Harry pick up a machine gun and parade up and down our streets? Or are our statutes forbidding the carrying of concealed weapons in keeping with the spirit of our Bill of Rights?

I read also that the right of trial by jury shall not be abridged, but I want to tell you that in our municipal courts all over this land men are being convicted without a jury trial for speeding and like crimes. Is this wide practice in our courts in keeping with our Bill of Rights? No thoughtful citizen will say it is not. In other words, we should consider the Bill of Rights in the light of present-day conditions.

Further, as a teacher of government, I have told my students time after time that legislation is the greatest work to which the human mind can devote itself, getting my idea from the ancient philosophers, such as Plato and Solon, as well as modern statesmen. Are not lawmakers sometimes called solons? I know it may be a misnomer for such as me, but it implies the possession of wisdom, wisdom largely based on knowledge no small part of which consists of facts. How can we legislate if we do not have facts? The complicated conditions in our national life make possession of facts more imperative for lawmakers every passing year.

I justify this housing census because, while I know the President has said a third of us are ill-housed, I do not know whether he is right or wrong. I would like to know how nearly right or wrong he is. There may be some who do not want to know the true situation. I have often remarked or implied that we have 130,000,000 people in this country, but is that guess anywhere near correct? I will find out the middle of this coming summer. We hear estimates given as to certain figures, but much of our legislating has been jumping in the dark without knowing where we were going, partly because we have not had the facts.

Why have the chemists and the physicists and all the other physical scientists made such progress? Because they can learn facts concerning animals or inanimate nature and work accordingly. Why have the sociologists, the political scientists, and the statesmen made so little progress? I tell you we have made comparatively little progress since that remarkable group of men laid down our basic law and the enduring foundations of our institutions back in 1787. Why have we made so little progress? Because in this field we cannot, must not experiment "guinea pig" fashion. Because we can find out only by making a social study, because we can find out only by inquiry of human beings what we need to know about man and thus know how to govern. This wider inquiry is made in that spirit. [Applause.]

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DITTER: On page 10, line 2, after "1941", strike out the period and insert a colon and the following: "Provided, however, That no part of the sum appropriated in this section shall be available for collecting any information the procurement of which depends upon the enforcement of section 9 of the act of June 18, 1929."

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered for the purpose of relieving the penalty feature of the act of 1929. It is presented largely because of the suggestion of the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM], who during the course of the colloquy earlier in the afternoon by implication, at least, suggested that he would not oppose the lifting of any penalty feature in connection with the procurement of information that might be objectionable to the people of the country. All this amendment does is follow out the suggestion made by my distinguished colleague from Virginia. It enables the enumerators to secure the information the people are willing to give.

However, it relieves those who feel that certain inquisitorial efforts are being made by enumerators and will permit them to avoid such an inquisition and also relieve them of the possibility of any penalty. I, therefore, feel that in view of the temper of the House as a whole that the amendment should be adopted. The census can be taken and all the information that a census should disclose will be secured, and I ask the favorable consideration of the committee for the amendment which I have just submitted.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DITTER. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi with one reservation, that neither power, politics, Pennsylvania, nor Mississippi is to be under consideration.

Mr. RANKIN. Fine! With that understanding, let me call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the fact that in 140 years every census bill has carried these provisions, and in 140 years there has never been a prosecution for failure to answer the questions.

Mr. DITTER. May I suggest to the gentleman that the amendment I have offered refers to a bill that was not written 150 years ago, but the act of 1929, which was only a few years ago, and if in his wisdom he sees fit to support this amendment, as I believe he will, then it will be entirely in line with his usual Democratic processes and his love of Jeffersonian philosophy. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. RANKIN. If the gentleman will yield further, let me say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the act of 1920 was passed by a Republican administration, and I see no reason why its provisions should not apply.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. If no Member now seeking recognition desires to be heard in opposition to the Ditter amendment, the Chair will put the question on that amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DITTER) there were—ayes 80, noes 92.

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed as tellers Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia and Mr. DITTER.

The Committee again divided and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 104, noes 99.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MCLEOD: Page 10, line 2, before the period, insert ", and no part of such sum shall be available for the compensation or expenses of any employee who insists upon persons answering questions with respect to the census of housing, authorized by such act of August 11, 1939, over their protest, oral or otherwise."

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment to safeguard the rights of our citizens when they are confronted with many of the ridiculous questions contained in the housing census questionnaire. This unprecedented census of housing will undoubtedly be taken between the hours of 9 and 5, and therefore the questions will be answered in most cases by the housewife. We all know that if the census enumerators call at that particular time the housewives will be confronted with questions relating to mortgages, trusts, liens, second mortgages, or so-called junior liens that it would in many cases be impossible for them to accurately answer without consulting the instruments concerning the property involved.

Section 9 of the Decennial Census Act provides penalties for persons who refuse to answer or fail to give correct information to census agents. My point is that if the average housewife or owner endeavors to answer the questions as contained in questions 28, 30, 31, 32, and 33, and his or her answers are proven to be partially false, untrue, or incorrect, they are liable to a Federal fine of $60 or imprisonment for 60 days, or both.

It is impossible in many States and cities to obtain the information required other than through the county courthouse, because, as you will recall, the language is "first mortgage on land contracts, second mortgage, or other junior liens." This can apply to many and various obligations against land or against a house, or whatever the property in question may be. This difficulty applies not only to the general property owner but to you Members present here today. I defy any Member here present, if he is a property owner, without an up-to-date memorandum to answer these questions and answer them accurately he may be in trouble.

The only thing involved in my amendment is to prevent unjust imprisonment and fine.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLEOD. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. I shall support the gentleman's amendment, but I would like to call the Committee's attention to this fact: There is no pretense here that this housing census will be taken for $5,000,000. I have here a letter from Mr. Austin, Director of the Census, bearing date of July 28, 1939, in which he states:

> The suggested appropriation of $8,000,000 (or even $8,500,000) for this purpose would not be sufficient to conduct a standard housing census which would cover all the subjects desired in such a census, but would provide only a minimum of the most essential statistics on the basis of which business, industry, and the Government could evaluate the present status and prospective trends of housing.

I have opposed this whole thing in committee, and I expect to continue my opposition, because it is an inquisition.

Mr. McLEOD. I thank the gentleman.

[Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan yields back 1 minute. Does any gentleman desire to be heard in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan? If not, the question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. McLEOD) there were—ayes 89, noes 95.

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas [Mr. POAGE] for 5 minutes.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Chairman, I yield back my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER] is recognized for 3½ minutes.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 10, line 2, after the period insert: "Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used to pay salaries of any census takers who require citizens to disclose their income."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I assure the committee at the outset that I am not considering politics when I offer this amendment, nor when I oppose the questions to be asked by the Census Bureau in connection with the proposed census. I always regret seeing a question of this kind decided by a party division. I am concerned solely because of the mail that I have received from the district that I represent. I do not keep a caucus list in my office and I do not know whether the people who write to me are Democrats or Republicans. I have reason to believe that many of them are Democrats, as I know that we have a good many Democrats in the district; at least, we did have in November 1938. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. LEAVY] pointed out that there was no question among those printed in the hearings that related to a man's income.

The gentleman is technically correct, because the questions listed in the hearings do not include questions related to income but simply those that specifically relate to the housing census. There is such a question, however, in the general census, the population census of 1940. Question No. 31 specifically refers to the amount of money, wages, or salary received, including commissions, and question 33 to the income of $50 or more from sources other than money, wages, or salaries.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Briefly.

Mr. PLUMLEY. I received a communication within the last 24 hours from a citizen of my State in which he advises me that he has offered to convey to the State of Vermont a piece of land of 30 or more acres in area for such use as the Government may see fit to make of it a detention camp to take care of those who may decline to answer these questions.

Mr. MILLER. I assure the gentleman from Vermont that I am advising all of my constituents to answer the questions asked, and I believe most of them will. However, I believe before Congress gets through considering this bill that the objectionable and illegal questions will be eliminated. I think it is our responsibility to indicate to Mr. Hopkins that we do not want him going into homes asking people intimate matters in respect to their income and whether they earned $50 or more outside of their income in the last year.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Yes.

Mr. TABER. Under the 1929 Census Act, section 4 says that the census and all subsequent censuses should be limited to questions relating to population, to agriculture, to irrigation, to drainage, to distribution, to unemployment, and to mining. It does not get any authority to ask the income of people.

Mr. MILLER. That is my contention; and at this point I challenge any Member of the House to put into the RECORD any authorization for these income questions or to state that in any census, or on anything other than a survey, questions of income were ever asked by the United States Government of its citizens.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. PLUMLEY] sought recognition of the Chair, but the time was limited. The gentleman from Connecticut has used 3 minutes of the 3½ minutes allotted to him, and the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. PLUMLEY] for half a minute.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, I yield back my time.

Mr. SHORT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. PLUMLEY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SHORT. I would like to suggest to the gentleman that the whole State of Vermont will not be large enough to house the people who refuse to answer these questions.

Mr. RANKIN. It housed the Republican Party 5 years ago. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. HARE] is recognized for 4 minutes.

Mr. HARE. Mr. Chairman, the crux of the opposition to this piece of legislation has been crystallized in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER]. In the early part of the day the opposition was confined to a "trespass upon the sanctity and privacy of the home," but when we learned this is nothing new for the Government a new approach must be found. Now, the question is whether or not the Government has a right to inquire into the incomes in a decennial census. The housing census is not a decennial census. It is a special census, and it is common information that the Government for the past hundred years has conducted inquiries and made investigation and taken what we know as a census, whether it is decennial or a 5-year census or a 2-year census, or what. In all of those investigations, in all of those inquiries, particularly the investigations or censuses of farming activities, wage earners, industrial activities, and so forth, they have invariably inquired as to income and the source of same. It was brought out earlier in the afternoon that time and time again Congress has authorized investigations, authorized inquiries, authorized that a census be taken on this, that, or the other thing, and in all of those they have inquired as to income. Time and time again you have inquired as to the income from farming operations. Not only that, you have inquired into the income of the various types of farming operations; you have broken them down from one to another. You have inquired as to the income of the wage earner; who employed him; how much he paid him; whether he was paid by the hour, by the week, the day, the month, or the year; and you have inquired into his annual income time and time again. But here is where we find the bug in the buttermilk.

It is all right to inquire into the income of the little farmer out in the rural district to see how much he is getting and where it is coming from, it is all right to inquire of the textile operator to see how much he is getting and where it is coming from, and how much he has in the course of a year to support his family; it is all right to inquire about the income of other industrial operatives; but when you prepare a schedule that will require of the bankers of this country the source and amount of their income, when you inquire of the capitalists of this country as to the source and the amount of their income, when you inquire of the great industrialists as to the source and amount of their income, then it becomes an inquiry that violates the sanctity and privacy of the home.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HARE. I yield.

Mr. REED of New York. Would the gentleman read into the RECORD the testimony of Dr. Austin, of the Census Bureau, as to the resistance they have received when they endeavored to inquire along the lines you are suggesting, and also read into the RECORD where he said that the census consequently was of little value?

Mr. HARE. The gentleman can read it into the RECORD in his own remarks. I anticipate that there will be objection on the part of the capitalists and industrialists.

Mr. REED of New York. I am talking about the farmers, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. HARE. No; I do not know it. Not one has mentioned it to me. But I know that farmers and cotton-mill operatives of my State have heretofore answered the questions of this Government time and time again under acts authorized by the Congress. They have answered the questions and none of them has ever been put in jail or the penitentiary for failure to do so. [Applause.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] is recognized for the remaining time of 5 minutes.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Vermont, the only Republican State in the Union that has remained Republican at all times, says that somebody has offered a certain number of acres of ground for a detention camp for the men who refuse to answer these questions. The distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT] rose in his wisdom and said that the whole State of Vermont would not be sufficient to hold all of the ones who would be prosecuted under this bill. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT] overlooks the fact that less than 5 years ago the State of Vermont held half the Republican Party. Does he think they will all be prosecuted, that they will all refuse to answer these questions, when there has not been a single prosecution for such refusal in 140 years? The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. PLUMLEY] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHORT] are both evidently aware of that fact.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. PLUMLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman, If that be the fact, why the necessity for carrying in the bill any provision for a prosecution?

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, the gentleman knows that whenever you require anything done by law, any man who refuses, commits a misdemeanor. That is a matter of common law that every lawyer is familiar with.

Now, Mr. Chairman, all of these attacks, all of these letters we have heard of coming from big income-tax payers, who fear they will have to reveal their income taxes, for fear that some of the manufacturers who clamored for wage and hour repeal will have to reveal the fact that it does not increase the wages of their employees because it is taken away from them in house rent. For fear that this information will be revealed, we find a few letters coming from that section of the United States to Republicans only, while not a Member on the Democratic side has had a letter protesting against this schedule.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. No. The gentleman from Pennsylvania needs information, and I want to give him some right now.

What they are attacking, Mr. Chairman, is the schedule that goes into the proposition of certain appliances in the homes of the American people. Why should we not give that information? You are not embarrassing anybody.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLEOD] says that the census will be taken between 9, and I believe he said, 3 o'clock. That may be the hours in Michigan, but down in the Southland where I live people work, as a rule, from sunup to sundown, or, at least, a sufficient number of hours to justify their employment. Furthermore, they will not depend on the housewife to answer all the questions. If they did, you would not have so much protest from the income-tax payers from Connecticut and Vermont.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. For a question.

Mr. PLUMLEY. For an observation?

Mr. RANKIN. Not for an observation, for a question only.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Then will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. PLUMLEY. Does not the gentleman appreciate that every Member on the floor of this House deprecates the fact that to every statute there is attached a penalty which, in the language of the gentleman, it is not expected will be enforced?

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, let me say to the gentleman from Vermont that every lawyer always deprecates a law that is against him in a lawsuit. He wishes the law were different, and invariably tries to get the judge so to instruct the jury.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. Can the gentleman inform us whether or not this same provision was in the Census Act of 10 years ago?

Mr. RANKIN. Why, of course, it was. It has been in the law all along.

Someone objected to the statement of the gentleman from South Carolina to the effect that in 1909, under the Taft administration, a law was passed providing for a special census, a census which went far more into detail than this one. It was also said that that act did not carry a penalty. It carried the usual penalty. If a man had violated the law, he could have been convicted and punished.

But nobody has ever been prosecuted. Why all this disturbance now? Because we propose to get certain information that is necessary for the compilation of these statistics and certain people fear they will have to reveal to the census taker their income taxes, which are already on record. Why, we find this protest coming from a little group here in the House who seem to have got all the mail protesting against this questionnaire.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Only for a question.

Mr. RICH. The gentleman stated that the census takers in his part of the country would work from sun to sun. Do not the people in that part of the country know there is now on the statute books a wage-hour law which fixes 42 hours a week as the maximum?

Mr. RANKIN. Oh, we take a good deal of time off at noon. [Laughter and applause.]

I have undertaken to tell you some things about household appliances. Nobody has ever denied those statements. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has got an hour, or 40 minutes, or some time to speak on Wednesday.

Mr. RICH. Nobody prepares my speeches, I may say to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. Well, we will wait and see if that speech does not bear the trade-mark of the hand of Esau and the voice of Jacob. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, this amendment should be voted down, and by all means this Ditter amendment should be stricken from the bill. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. TABER moves that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has the floor. Does the gentleman yield for a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. TABER. Not at this time.

Mr. DINGELL. Is not a parliamentary inquiry always in order?

The CHAIRMAN. Not unless the Member having the floor yields for that purpose.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the motion made by the gentleman from New York is not in order. The motion to strike out the enacting clause is a motion of very high privilege and not to be offered unless in good faith. It is obvious that the gentleman offers this motion at this time merely to secure time for debate.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, this is offered in good faith. I shall insist upon a division, and tellers, if I can get them.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, on that statement of the gentleman from New York, that he offers the motion in good faith, I withdraw my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the point of order is withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, this bill is a menace to the liberties of America. So that you may get a full picture of the operation that has been presented to you, I call your attention to the Census Act of 1929. Section 4 thereof reads as follows:

The fifteenth and subsequent censuses—

The fifteenth is this one—shall be restricted to inquiries relating to population, to agriculture, to irrigation, to drainage, to distribution, to unemployment, and to mines. The number, form, and subdivision of the inquiries in the schedules used to take the census shall be determined by the Director of the Census with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce.

Included in the regular census is the item:

Income in 1939. Amount of money, wages, or salary received, including commission. Did this person receive an income of $50 or more from sources other than money, wages, or salary.

Mr. Chairman, that is clearly a usurpation of authority. It is clearly without authority that that question is included in the items handed out to the enumerators, and under these circumstances it is a fraud on the American people. The act calling for the housing census says that information may be had concerning the number, characteristics, and geographical distribution of dwelling structures and dwelling units in the United States. There is nothing whatever permitting the requesting of information as to the amount of rent or the value of the property. The whole thing is unauthorized by law. No court in the world would convict any person for refusing to answer those inquisitorial questions. No Congress would ever pass a law requiring such things to be done. Under these circumstances it is absolutely ridiculous to appropriate any money for an outfit which is simply trying to usurp power, annoy and harass the people of the United States.

The only way we have of stopping this ridiculous usurpation of power and foolish operation is to strike out this whole paragraph and not appropriate one dollar for it. There is no law that requires anyone to answer such questions, and I hope the Congress will not now appropriate money to support things that are not authorized by law. I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] will be agreed to, and thereby we will save $5,000,000 of the Treasury's money and set our goal toward saving money, not throwing it away foolishly. Not a single one of these housing projects has provided a place in which anyone could live who was driven out of a slum project and no one exists in many of these places who can comply with the requirements of the Housing Authority for occupancy.

Mr. RABAUT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the motion offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. Chairman, Public Act No. 387, Seventy-sixth Congress, first session, Senate 2240, to provide for a national census of housing, under section 2, states:

All of the provisions, including the penalties of the act providing for the fifteenth and subsequent decennial census, approved June 18, 1929—shall apply to the taking of the census provided for in section 1 of this act.

And so forth—

Section 3 reads:

For the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act there is authorized to be appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated not to exceed $8,000,000 to cover the estimated cost of such census.

Act approved August 11, 1939.

Mr. Chairman, that is the record of the action of this Congress. Within a short space of a few months we have all this political thunder that has been handed out on the floor today. I make one plea here and that plea is for sincerity. On February 8 we had this same request from the gentleman from New York, who then demanded a roll call. The yeas were 134 and the nays were 211. Now, we have it all over again. It is just filling up the RECORD with the same talk that we had here on February 8 last in connection with the bill and an act passed by this House on August 11.

Who wants this census? The heavy-goods industry people of this country want the housing census. The builders and architects and real estate men, the makers of and the dealers in cement and brick and lumber and gravel and paint and glass and all other materials, the makers of construction machinery—all these, and many others, have a stake in such a census.

Who, then, are its opponents? Let them stand up and be counted. That should be a simple operation, for they are so few that they were almost invisible 6 months ago, when the housing census was authorized by Congress.

It would be a long and laborious, almost impossible task merely to read the list of important associations, agencies, and individuals who are on record as favoring this census.

The National Retail Lumber Dealers' Association and the National Lumber Manufacturers' Association are in favor of it. So are the Portland Cement Association, the National Sand and Gravel Association, the Structural Clay Products Institute, the Metal Window Institute, the National Lime Association, the National Paint, Varnish, and Lacquer Association.

The National Association of Real Estate Boards passed a resolution requesting Congress to authorize this year census questions on housing, home ownership, taxing, and home financing.

The National Association of Housing Officials also appealed to Congress for a full housing census and so did the housing boards of New York State and Pennsylvania.

In 1937 unemployment census showed that unemployment in the construction industry is a major factor in the whole unemployment situation. It showed more than three-quarters of a million building-industry workers were totally unemployed or at work on emergency jobs. And it showed another 400,000 who gave this industry as their usual occupation but were partially unemployed.

We are trying to bring this country out of a slump and to the place where the people will seek home ownership. We are making a plea for home ownership so that the people in this country may have a stake. A majority in the House approved the Dies committee investigation of un-American activities, but when we attempt to do something that provides the information necessary for people in this country to have concerning the housing problem, then we find political opposition.

Let us be sincere. Let us put this thing where it belongs. Do we want to establish home ownership or are we against it? Do we desire to make known to the people of this Nation the true picture of home conditions as they exist, or do we just want to feed them some language? I, for one, am anxious that this problem be made known.

The Government has gone into the housing problem. Whether you approve or disapprove does not enter into this legislation. The housing problem has at least brought out the fact that those with money can go and do the same job privately and at a lesser cost than has been done by the Government. Private capital wants to know all the angles of the housing problem. Capital will not risk large operations where it does not know the facts. It cannot be expected to. It should be given the facts, so that it can invest with confidence in those housing fields where there is a known market for its products. Therefore the functions of government should supply the information, and the information will be derived from this housing census.

Mr. Chairman, I have the greatest respect for those who have the spirit of economy in mind, and I think I can hold my head high with the best of them. As a matter of fact, the subcommittee of which I happen to be chairman last year was tops in cutting below the Budget. So our committee, having to do with the legislative branch on appropriations, is taking no back seat as far as economy is concerned.

But housing calls into being the artisans of countless labor trades and public-spirited groups such as the American Society of Planning Officials, the American Public Health Association, and the American Home Economics Association, also the Associated General Contractors, the United States Conference of Mayors, the American Institute of Architects, the Producers' Council, the Construction League of America, and the National Association of Master Plumbers. And so I could go on, but may I conclude with the statement the American Federation of Labor has openly endorsed this program.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TABER) there were—ayes 99, noes 111.

So the motion was rejected.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the Committee for 5 minutes.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, has not debate been closed on this paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been closed on the paragraph, but the gentleman is asking unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. The gentleman's side closed debate. I think it is presumptuous to submit such a request, and I object to it.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. My request is to speak out of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. I object to his proceeding out of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER].

Without objection, the Clerk will again report the Miller amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk again read the Miller amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED] to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. REED of New York) there were—ayes 102, noes 115.

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chairman appointed as tellers Mr. REED of New York and Mr. O'NEAL.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 124, noes 142.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Alaska Railroad: The limitation of $11,000 upon the amount that may be expended for printing and binding from the appropriations for the Alaska Railroad contained in the Interior Department Appropriation Act, 1939, and the Second Deficiency Appropriation Act, fiscal year 1939, is hereby increased to $11,972.25.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, in 1910, in the Sixty-first Congress, John Dalzell of Pennsylvania, at that time a member of the Committee on Rules, a committee consisting of three, the Speaker of the House, the leader of the minority, and Mr. Dalzell, made the statement in the course of debate that the Rules of the House of Representatives of the United States were not only the most perfect system of rules in the world but the most perfect system of procedure that could be devised, so perfect in fact that it was doubtful whether any further amendment was possible.

If Mr. Dalzell, great statesman and great parliamentarian that he was, could come back today he would hardly recognize the rules of the House of Representatives, so completely and so fundamentally have they been revised and rewritten.

In the 30 years that have intervened since that statement was made we have adapted and adjusted our system of procedure until we have evolved through experiment and practice a remarkably serviceable system of procedure. It is possible that the next generation will look back on that statement in the same light in which we now regard the complacent appraisal of the great Pennsylvanian, but at least one thing has been accomplished. We no longer hear discussions on the floor and in the cloakrooms of proposed amendments to the rules. I can recall when the rules were the subject of almost daily debate on the floor and "liberalization" of the rules was an issue in national platforms and campaigns. There were modifications of the rules at the opening of every Congress and a general revision with every change of administration. Only in comparatively recent years have the rules approached a degree of permanent standardization where they have ceased to be the object of comment or complaint. For the present at least, regardless of what the parliamentarians of 1970 may think of them, the rules of the Seventy-sixth Congress answer every requirement.

One practice, however, has grown up, and is being resorted to with increasing frequency of late, which, if continued, will require some change, either in the rules themselves or preferably through the decision of some able and experienced chairman. It is the unwarranted practice of using, on every occasion and any occasion, the motion to strike out the enacting clause for the purpose of obtaining the floor for debate. Of late, there is rarely an instance in which a consent agreement is secured to limit debate in the Committee of the Whole but what some Member nullifies the agreement and disregards the established rules of debate by moving to strike out the enacting clause. The Member could have asked to be included at the time debate was agreed on and have had his quota of time in regular order, but he waits until all time has expired and the Committee has closed debate, as is its right, and then disrupts the proceedings by again opening the question to debate in disregard of the understanding to which all interested Members on both sides of the aisle have agreed, or by vitiating the right of those in charge of the bill to close debate. Such misuse of the motion is unwarranted and is in bad taste and verges on bad faith. If my warm, personal friend from New York will indulge me by permitting me to use his recent motion as an example, in answer to my point of order, he said he had made the motion in good faith.

Now, of course, he did make it in good faith in the sense that he desired to eliminate that provision of the bill. But, as a matter of fact, his only purpose in making the motion was to secure the floor, as is shown by the fact that when he closed his remarks, he closed them, not with the expressed hope that the enacting clause be stricken out, but, as he very plainly said, in the hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Connecticut would be agreed to. No such use of the rule was ever contemplated. It is a motion of dignity and high privilege. To prostitute it to such menial use is on a par with invoking the great writ of habeas corpus to release a chicken thief from the village calaboose. It is as unparliamentary as mob rule. It supersedes the fundamental rules of debate. It is neither fair nor logical. It wastes the time of the House and disorganizes established procedure and, to that degree, reflects upon those responsible for the integrity of House and committee procedure.

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota.

Mr. MUNDT. Will the gentleman advise me, a new Member of the House, what other course a Member may take to get access to the floor if a situation arises such as occurred last Friday, when debate was ruthlessly closed and no time was permitted, except about 34 minutes out of the day, for Members other than committee members to introduce amendments? What other recourse does a Member have except to offer such a motion?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. That would not give a Member an opportunity to introduce an amendment, it would merely give him 5 minutes to interfere with the orderly program of the House.

Mr. MUNDT. It would give him 5 minutes to present the viewpoint of his constituents.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. If the rules permitted every Member of the House time in which to present the views of his constituents, we would never be able to dispose of the business of the House in an ordinary session. Gentlemen may extend their remarks, and in full, on any bill under consideration and still keep within legitimate procedure.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. McCORMACK. May I say with regard to the observation of the gentleman from South Dakota that debate was ruthlessly closed, that that, of course, is a matter of opinion; but may I call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that the debate went along for nearly 2 hours before the motion to limit debate was made by the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to speak for 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. The right of the House to close debate is indispensable. Without it, debate would proceed endlessly. And the right of the Committee or the proponent to close debate is axiomatic. To interfere with either right is disorderly and should be so held by the Chair.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. WARREN. The gentleman from Missouri is recognized as one of the greatest parliamentarians who ever sat in the House of Representatives. As we all know, he has written a monumental work on the subject of parliamentary procedure, and therefore I feel quite fortified in having the gentleman take the same position I endeavored to take on Friday on exactly the same question. The gentleman is entirely correct, and I hope that some chairman, some day, will rule accordingly.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I may state that I was moved to make this comment by the argument on the point of order recently raised by the gentleman from North Carolina. He is one of the ablest parliamentarians of the House, and one of the most efficient presiding officers who occupies the chair, and his point of order was so well taken and so well supported that it is to be hoped that some strong presiding officer will follow the suggestion made by the distinguished gentleman from North Carolina and establish this much-needed precedent.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say in connection with the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WARREN] that the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], who is now addressing the House, is the greatest parliamentarian in the world and the greatest one that has occupied a seat in any parliamentary body since the death of James R. Mann, of Illinois. [Applause.]

Mr. CROWTHER and Mr. VAN ZANDT rose.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CROWTHER. But once in 21 years of service have I offended against the rule the gentleman speaks of. This happened on last Friday. Does the gentleman think that such a procedure contains any element of unfairness if the opportunity is given the opposition to rise in opposition to the motion?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri.. I am certain the distinguished gentleman from New York, with whom it has been my privilege to serve here so long, understands that I am speaking purely in the abstract and had no personal reference in mind. Nothing which has been said was intended——

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri may have 1 more minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CROWTHER. On the occasion I refer to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] rose in opposition and really closed the debate on that question. It seems to me there is no element of unfairness as long as provision is made for a rejoinder. I do not think there is any element of unfairness in it. I was not permitted to close the debate. I was only permitted to speak, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. McCORMACK] rose in opposition and really closed the debate.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. My friend from New York understands there is no possible ground for criticism of anyone who has used the motion. It has been used on all sides and by everybody and on every occasion.

The very promiscuity of its use is the occasion for this discussion—and for the early adoption of some means of remedying the unfortunate situation it has brought about. I am certain the gentleman from New York will cooperate in restoring the rule to its original use and restricting its use to its legitimate functions. Whenever the motion is offered it should raise in the mind of the Chair and of the Members of the Committee the question: "What is the purpose of the gentleman in offering the motion; is the motion proposed for the purpose of discontinuing consideration of the bill, or is it offered for the purpose of securing time and disrupting the order of debate?" And when obviously offered for the latter purpose it should never be recognized.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. With pleasure.

Mr. CROWTHER. I would have been very pleased to have had the enacting clause stricken out of the bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; but the gentleman attempted to withdraw his motion after he had his 5 minutes.

Mr. CROWTHER. Well, that is customary with a pro forma motion. It was offered as a pro forma motion. [Laughter.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. A great tribute has been paid the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] on his ability as a parliamentarian, but he was violating the procedure of the House when he was not confining his discussion to the business before this body.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has not stated a parliamentary inquiry. With all deference, the Chair may say that the Chair recognized the gentleman for that purpose, but the gentleman has failed to state a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the pending motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I think it well to call attention to the fact, as bearing on what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] has said, that he himself was, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VAN ZANDT] has pointed out, violating the rules of the House by not addressing himself to the question.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, if I heard the gentleman from Missouri correctly, he asked unanimous consent to speak out of order for 5 minutes.

Mr. LUCE. Then I withdraw that comment, because I did not hear that request made. Further, while I appreciate the importance of what the gentleman from Missouri has said, there are exceptions to all rules. There arise occasions when a man might well transgress the rules of the House to defend himself, to answer a new argument, or to present something that will be of help to the House. Therefore, while I think that the rule ought generally to be observed, to say that any exception to it whatever is violation of wise practice seems to me somewhat extreme. I myself in the course of a debate on an appropriation bill recently misunderstood the situation and found myself precluded from having the attention of the House. It seemed to me of importance at the moment that the House should at least know the consideration that I cared to present and therefore I, as very rarely have I done, violated the spirit of the rules of the House in this particular in order to present a thing that it seemed to me the House ought to consider. Laying down of iron-clad rules permitting no exception under any circumstances does not seem to me essential for good legislation. [Applause.]

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. CANNON of Missouri. Permit me to say, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] is, in my opinion, the most distinguished parliamentary authority of the House. [Applause.] He served a notable apprenticeship as president of his State senate and as chairman of the committee on rules and procedure of the Massachusetts Constitutional Convention, and his scholarly works on legislative procedure and legislative assemblies and kindred subjects are accepted as the most authoritative in American literature and jurisprudence. I much appreciate his suggestions. He has summarized the practice succinctly and accurately and with his cooperation we should be able to strike the happy medium in which the motion will be available when needed for the purposes he suggests and at the same time be surrounded with reasonable restraints. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Not to exceed $15,000 of the appropriation "Salaries, Wage and Hour Division, Department of Labor, 1940", shall be available for transfer to the appropriation "Contingent expenses, Department of Labor, 1940", and not to exceed $65,000 of the appropriation "Salaries, Wage and Hour Division, Department of Labor, 1940", shall be available for transfer to the appropriation for miscellaneous expenses (other than salaries), Wage and Hour Division: Provided, That such appropriation for salaries, Wage and Hour Division, shall be available for reimbursement to State, Federal, and local agencies and their employees for services rendered.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. When the wage and hour bill was pending in the House and brought up for consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the two occasions that it was considered by the Committee of the Whole, I had the honor and the pleasure of being designated by the Speaker to serve as the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole. It was also my pleasure to vote for the passage of the bill. It is my purpose to make a few observations which I think, if noticed by those who are administering the law, will probably be conducive to the successful operation of the law. What I say is not in the nature of criticism but in the nature of a suggestion to those who have the responsibility of administering the law to be tolerant in the administration of the same, and particularly so during the early stages of the operation of this important and far-reaching piece of legislation. We all know that the success of any law is in its administration. A legislative body may pass a bill that is poorly worded or which has weaknesses, but at its outset, if those who administer the law exercise sound judgment and good common sense, the law, having a desirable objective, will be a success. On the other hand, the best bill that a legislative body can pass, having an objective that is desirable or necessary and agreed to by all, will be unsuccessful if those who administer it do not exercise good judgment and common sense. The wage and hour law is a piece of legislation of general and broad application. It affects many millions of employees, and it also affects tens of thousands of employers. Particularly in the early stages of such a law, those who administer it should be as broad and tolerant in its application as any discretion vested in them by the law will permit. I have had a few cases called to my attention wherein I feel that those responsible for the administration of the law might use a little more caution and care. I can easily see that in the near future, if many more cases of that kind arise throughout the country, there is likely to be a reaction, not against the administration of the law but against the law itself, which all of us who voted for the passage of the law would regret and deplore. Our employers are in the front-line trenches.

They have their troubles; they have their responsibilities, trying to obtain business in order to raise the money which will enable them to meet their pay rolls. They also have a natural desire to obtain a reasonable return upon the money they have invested. It is for the best interest not only of the employer, but of the employees of the country that those who administer this law—and I say this, as I stated before, from the angle of suggestion and not from the angle of criticism—exercise tolerance, broadness, care, and caution in seeing that the relationship between employer and employee is not unreasonably disturbed.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. AUGUST H. ANDRESEN. One of the purposes of that law was to increase employment in this country, and I say to the gentleman, in line with what he has already said, that thousands of men in small business are being put out of business because of the administration of the wage and hour law.

Mr. McCORMACK. Without agreeing or disagreeing with my friend, nevertheless this far-reaching law, which has such a proper and necessary objective, should be administered with care and with caution. Employers should not in particular be unreasonably pressed upon during the early stage of the operation of this law. Such a course is for the best interests of employees and their continued employment.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McCORMACK. I yield.

Mr. RAMSPECK. As one of those who helped draft the law, I will say that I agree wholeheartedly with everything the gentleman has stated.

Mr. McCORMACK. I thank my friend from Georgia.

In conclusion, I hope that the few remarks I have made today will serve as a warning, a wise warning to those who are administering the law, because upon their shoulders rest the responsibility of making the success that we who fought for the passage of the law so greatly desire.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Maintenance and operation of the Panama Canal: For an additional amount for the maintenance and operation of the Panama Canal, fiscal year 1940, including the same objects specified under this head in the War Department Civil Appropriation Act, 1940, $191,000, to remain available until expended.

Mr. IZAC. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. IZAC: On page 20, line 17, strike out "$1,500,000" and insert "$2,000,000."

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I am compelled to make a point of order against the amendment. The Clerk has passed that section. The Clerk had read down to page 21.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has correctly stated the situation.

Mr. IZAC. I was on my feet, Mr. Chairman. I stood by the side of the chairman of the subcommittee, and I ask for recognition.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I have no alternative except to make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. And the Chair has no alternative except to state, under the circumstances, the point of order is sustained.

Mr. KELLER. The gentleman is well within his rights, Mr. Chairman, because we are not reading the entire sections at all, but simply reading the amounts. It is only fair that the gentleman should be heard on this matter.

Mr. IZAC. I wonder if we could get unanimous consent to make my plea before the Committee.

I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, does that mean the gentleman wants to talk or he wants to offer an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks to strike out the last word. The request is that the gentleman have unanimous consent to proceed for 5 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. IZAC. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to take issue with the Appropriations Committee on this matter, but I think they are wrong, so I intended to draw it to the attention of the committee.

We have in this civil function for the War Department item an appropriation for $1,500,000 for dredging San Diego Harbor. The reason for the dredging is that we have 190 war vessels using that small harbor. There is not great danger to the ships from collision, but rather because of their running aground on the mud flats of San Diego Bay. The Navy Department and the War Department both recognize the necessity of having this dredging speeded up.

I appeared before the Rivers and Harbors Committee in 1937 and obtained $4,184,000 authorization for this job. So far we have appropriated $1,000,000. The War Department and the Navy Department appealed to the Appropriations Committee, and they were backed up by the Bureau of the Budget, to hasten this dredging by giving us $2,000,000 this year. The $2,000,000 would have completed what was needed for the Navy Department for the mooring, berthing, and anchorage of the ships that are to be based at San Diego. We are having about 40 of the old destroyers put into commission. In addition to that the new ships which you have authorized to be built for the Navy are coming in very rapidly. There is not room in San Diego Harbor for the berthing of those ships. That is the reason we asked that the dredging be speeded up. I truly believe the Appropriations Committee is making a mistake in not permitting this dredging to go ahead a little faster.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IZAC. I yield.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. The gentleman knows the original cost of the project was $4,000,000.

Mr. IZAC. That is right.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. They have had $1,000,000 and there was a half million dollars in the 1941 bill.

Mr. IZAC. That is right.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. That is the regular course that the project was supposed to take.

Mr. IZAC. Not arbitrarily; no.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. But that is what it was.

Mr. IZAC. That is the way it has been going.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Now, the $1,500,000 speeds the project up just that much, because you have had $1,000,000 up to date, and the committee only gave you a half million for next year, and except for this $1,500,000, that is the route which the project would have taken. This $1,500,000 speeds up your project just to that extent.

Mr. IZAC. But let me point this out to the gentleman: If we can let all of these contracts at the same time, we can get the dredging done for 8 or 9 cents a cubic yard instead of 12 or 14 cents, and it will actually save the Government money, for we would probably not have to spend the full $4,184,000 originally authorized. It is just that we happen to know this is the best way to do it that I come before the Committee and make my presentation. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Title II—Judgments and authorized claims.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, title II is judgments and authorized claims which have been audited. I feel confident there is no controversy over this title or that no amendment will be offered to this section. If this be so a great deal of time could be saved by considering the title read.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that title II of the bill may be considered as having been read.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WHITTINGTON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8641) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, to provide supplemental appropriations for such fiscal year, and for other purposes, directed him to report the same back to the House with an amendment with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and the amendment to final passage.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on the amendment?

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a separate vote on the Ditter amendment.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the Clerk will report the amendment for the information of the House.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DITTER: On page 10, line 2, after the figures "1941", strike out the period, insert a colon, and the following: "Provided, however, That no part of the sum appropriated in this section shall be available for collecting any information the procurement of which depends upon the enforcement of section 9 of the act of June 18, 1929."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts) there were—ayes 109, noes 128.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 139, nays 196, not voting 90, as follows:

AMENDMENT OF BANKRUPTCY ACT

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 6505) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," and ask unanimous consent that the statement be read in lieu of the report.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, has that action been approved by the minority?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. It has been approved by everybody.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6505) to amend an Act entitled "An Act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved July 1, 1898," and Acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 2.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 1 and agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6505) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, submit the following explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon in conference, and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

Amendment No. 1: This Senate amendment is merely clarifying. The House agrees to the substitution of the words "the foregoing section" for the words "this act."

Amendment No. 2: Senate amendment 2 made substantive changes in the Municipal Bankruptcy Act. These included bringing counties and parishes within the terms of the act; extending the life of the act to June 30, 1942; providing that proof of delivery of securities covered by the plan should be deemed to constitute written consent of the plan and providing that confirmation of a plan should not be denied on the grounds that the plan submitted for confirmation is at variance with the partially completed original plans if the terms of the plan submitted for confirmation are not less favorable to creditors than the terms of the original plan nor on the grounds that partial completion of the plan had made it possible for the petitioner to meet its debts as they mature. The House conferees were of the opinion that these substantive amendments properly should be considered as a separate bill rather than as an amendment to H. R. 6505. The Senate recedes.

HATTON W. SUMNERS,
EMANUEL CELLER,
CHARLES F. MCLAUGHLIN,
U. S. GUYER,
CHAUNCEY W. REED,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. REED of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, in 1937 Congress amended the bankruptcy statutes by enacting the so-called Wilcox law, commonly referred to as the Municipal Bankruptcy Act or the Municipal Compositions Act. Under it any of certain enumerated classes of municipalities is permitted to file in a Federal court a petition stating that such municipality is insolvent or unable to meet its debts as they mature and that it desires to effect a plan for their composition. The proposed plan, which must have been previously assented to by creditors of the municipality owning not less than 51 percent in amount of the affected securities, is filed with the petition. After due notice to the remaining creditors, a hearing is conducted by the court, in which sponsors of and objectors to the plan are given full opportunity to voice their approval or disapproval. The plan, if then accepted in writing by the bona fide creditors holding at least two-thirds of the aggregate amount of claims of all classes affected and confirmed by the court, may then be made operative in composing the debts of the petitioning municipality. Appeals are provided for to review the decision of the district court. Among the taxing agencies enumerated in the present law which are permitted to file petitions for the purpose of effecting a composition of their obligations are local improvement districts. In many States, among them Illinois, there are no such municipal corporations. In these States the city, village, or town, as the case may be, initiates the improvement. It assesses the property to be improved, issues and disposes of the bonds, collects the assessments levied against the real estate, and applies the proceeds thereof to the payment of principal and interest on the bonds. The obligations created are a lien against the property affected by the improvement and are in nowise a debt of the municipality, which merely acts in the capacity of a trustee—collecting and paying off. Under the law as it now exists, such municipalities are barred from effecting a composition of their special assessments, because under the general terms of the act they must, in their petition to the court, state that they are insolvent and unable to meet their debts, when in fact such may not be the case. Many of the States in which these municipalities are located have passed laws for the refunding of special-assessment bonds, but such laws are of no avail, because a compromise of the obligations cannot be effected without the unanimous consent of the holders of the securities. The only recourse of such municipalities is in the courts of bankruptcy; and through an inadvertent omission in the law, not foreseen or contemplated at the time of its consideration by the Congress, the doors of the courtrooms are theoretically closed in their faces. To correct this omission, H. R. 6505 was designed and passed. Under its provisions, jurisdiction is given to the Federal court when the petitioning municipality avers that—

The property liable for the payment of such securities, principal, and interest is not of sufficient value to pay same, and that the accrued interest on such securities is past due and in default.

This legislation received the approval of the house of delegates of the American Bar Association at its meeting in Chicago in January of 1939. The committee on special assessments of real property and special assessment obligations of the municipal law section of the association, in its report, said:

The reason for including special assessment bonds within the Federal bankruptcy power is that in many parts of the country there is a considerable volume of such bonds secured by special assessments so excessive in relation to the value of the land that they never can be enforced. It is in the interest of all concerned that a fair adjustment be made. The holders of the securities will benefit by getting new securities for an amount which they may reasonably expect to be paid. The owners of the land assessed will benefit by having their land relieved of an insupportable lien for one which can be met. The public will gain by having the land made marketable and available for development and use. * * *

The part of the Bankruptcy Act relating to municipalities will expire, according to its present terms, on June 30, 1940. It may or may not be extended. But while it lasts no good reason appears for excluding special-assessment bonds from its operation and every reason for including them. The consideration which suggested the act for full faith and credit bonds applies equally to special-assessment securities. * * *

The measure under consideration, H. R. 6505, was reported to the House with the unanimous approval of the Committee on the Judiciary and passed this body without a dissenting vote. Several amendments were added in the Senate, which resulted in its being sent to conference. The conference committee recommends the elimination of all of those amendments except one, which is merely of a clarifying nature. I trust that the report will, like the bill itself, receive the unanimous approval of this House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SOCIAL-SECURITY LAW

I WANT FEDERAL PENSIONS FOR THE AGED ON PAY-AS-YOU-GO BASIS NOW

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, I urge the immediate passage of H. R. 8264, a bill to provide for national recovery by raising revenue and retiring citizens past 60 years of age from gainful employment and provide for the general welfare of all the people of the United States, and for other purposes. I believe that each of you realize with me the eminent necessity of more adequate security for the aged of our Nation and also, you know as well as I do, that existing social-security legislation has not fully met this requirement. It is true that social-security legislation now in existence has carried helpful benefits to some of the aged, the blind, needy, children, and the weak. Only a small percentage of those entitled to and in need of these benefits have been able to receive them. This lack of assistance is caused both by the inadequacy of the legislation itself and by the various States not sufficiently matching funds.

TITLES I AND II, SOCIAL SECURITY ACT

Of the existing social-security legislation, I would call your particular attention to titles I and II of the Social Security Act, as amended. These are the provisions which should be repealed and for which reasonable, just, and fair legislation should be substituted.

It has been estimated that of an average group of 1,000 American citizens over 65 years of age, in 1937, only 128 had current earnings, only 150 had savings, and only 73 had public or private pensions, while 203 were dependent wholly or in part on private or public charity, and 446 were living on the hand-outs of friends and relatives. This revelation was made by statistics prepared, I believe, by the Social Security Board. These statistics show the alarming need for adequate help for the some 7,000,000 citizens in America above 65 years of age, and also for almost an equal number between 60 and 65 years of age.

There are between thirteen and fourteen million American citizens over 60 years of age. According to the above statistics, some 85 percent of them were in need of assistance or were actually receiving assistance.

A few weeks ago there was an announcement from the Social Security Board that $114,000,000 would be distributed among 912,000 old people this year. This, of course, is only about $10 per month, and bear in mind that this 912,000 is only about 25 percent of those in the country who are above 65 years of age, and who are in desperate need.

The average pension or income of $10 per month for a person 65 years of age or above, is so meager and inadequate that it is ridiculous. Now, I am not condemning these payments because they have helped and are helping the aged of our country a great deal, but what I am trying to impress upon you is the great necessity of the Congress to now pass pay-as-you-go pension legislation which will bring security for all of the aged citizens in our country.

Under existing law, the Federal Government puts up $20 per month, providing this $20 is equally matched by the State. Under the existing plan, the State of California is the only State fully matching the $20 and paying a pension of $40 per month. The scale goes on down among the several States, and reaches a low of average pension in another State of $5.80 per month. The total average paid throughout the United States, in all States, is $19 per month.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Does the gentleman think those with large-income capacity should be willing to take care of the aged?

Mr. GREEN. I appreciate the gentleman's inquiry, and I certainly do. Further in my remarks, I will discuss that subject. The large-income receivers undoubtedly should be willing to contribute their portion toward the security of the aged of our country. I will give later in my remarks also some of the incomes of the larger corporation presidents and individuals.

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr VOORHIS of California. My own State I believe is the only State in the Union where the people are in a position to have the full advantage of the amount of money paid under the Social Security Act. For my part I do not believe this problem will ever be solved until we have a national pension system which deals alike with people of all sections of the country. If, as many of the world economists contend, one of our principal problems is the problem of the lack of balance between money saved for investment purposes, and money spent on current consumption of goods currently produced, does not the gentleman believe some such system as this is necessary to correct that?

Mr. GREEN. The gentleman is obviously correct. One of the main troubles with the present social-security law is that the weaker States are not now participating share and share alike with the richer States.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. The gentleman admits that the present Social Security Act with its exorbitant pay roll on the rank and file of the workers is indefensible, does he not?

Mr. GREEN. I contend that the present social-security set-up in the way it affects the aged is not adequate. It is wrong. It draws contributions from the wage earners, and many of those small wage earners are never able to participate in any income advantage; so the obvious responsibility for the gentleman and for myself and for the Congress is to pass a bill which will make the responsibility fall on the higher income as well as the small income, and let the aged of the land throughout the country share and share alike in the benefits.

UNFAIR TO WEAK STATES

I would not have you get the impression that all of the aged citizens in the various States who are in need are receiving these pensions—quite to the contrary. I can speak better for my own State than I can for others. Our State has failed to provide funds to adequately match the Federal offer and, through regulations, fully three-fourths of the aged who should receive pensions are not getting a thin dime. In other words, the "need clause" is forcefully stressed, making it practically impossible for one to get any allowance unless he is, in fact, a destitute pauper. The poor States are not able to match the $20 per month, or they are not doing it, and through default of this matching, funds from the weak States are siphoned out into the rich States. The powerful and rich States are the ones that are matching the highest Federal funds. When a small, weak State defaults on matching, the people of this State still pay into the social-security fund their industrial and employment pro rata of Federal taxes. They enrich the national fund which is in turn siphoned out into the powerful States. This plan is wrong.

An aged person can be just as hungry in Florida, Georgia, or Arkansas as he is in California, Pennsylvania, or New York. Hunger respects no State line and destitution chooses no particular locality. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. As the gentleman well knows, I am tremendously interested and deeply concerned about the subject of old-age security. I am also interested in the gentleman's remarks on that important subject. Permit me to add I agree wholeheartedly that we will never have a satisfactory Federal pension system until it deals with all sections alike. I agree also that the present system penalizes those living in the poorer States and have so stated many times during the past dozen years. Moreover, I agree thoroughly with the gentleman's statement that those with higher incomes should share in the contributions to the aged people. I have not read the bill to which the gentleman refers, but I am glad to hear the gentleman, who has been a consistent advocate of liberal old-age security benefits, say his bill is proposed to be financed on what seems to be a sound scientific basis. A gross-income tax is far more preferable, practical, and reasonable than the so-called transaction tax, which I have always contended was no more nor less than a pyramided sales tax.

Mr. GREEN. Yes. I thank the gentleman from Oklahoma, who, I am delighted to say, is a true and sincere friend of the aged people of America, and who has given much time and study to the problem of aiding in working out a fair and satisfactory measure for the deserving old people of America. Now, we contend that it should be based upon gross-income tax of those who have incomes of $250 a month and above.

The citizens of my State are in dead earnest about obtaining passage of legislation for real security for the aged. They are organizing in all parts of the State and are earnestly and actively cooperating with the Florida delegation in Congress for passage of this legislation.

The St. Petersburg Advocate on the 10th of this month carried a report of the State-wide meeting held in Orlando, Fla., and attended by thousands. The report is as follows:

At 2:30 the mass meeting called at the Municipal Auditorium got under way. On the spacious stage, amid neatly arrayed palms, a perfect southern setting, were three Congressmen of the State of Florida who had voted for H. R. 6466 and thus placed themselves in the 101 immortals that will live long in American history.

Word had been received by Manley Goldsberry that J. HARDIN PETERSON, Representative from the First Congressional District, would be unable to attend. He sent his greetings and promise that he would continue to follow and fight for T. N. R. P. legislation.

GREEN SPEAKS

Congressman LEX GREEN was the first one to be introduced. LEX started the bombardment with a shot heard high. "Victory for the Townsend plan is within our immediate reach. I have never been as optimistic about success as I am today," spoke GREEN.

"The reasons are apparent. First, the language of the new bill, which will shortly be explained by Congressman HENDRICKS, is just about perfect. It is the plainest and the fairest. It takes the burden off the weak and puts it on the strong. Yes; the coupon clippers. You and I and others of the rank and file will fight until this bill is written into law.

"My friends, I have put on my fighting armor, my heart is full and I am ready to fight with every means—now and in the future until security for the aged is brought to my people." Congressman GREEN received a popular vote of confidence from the convention as he left.

JOE HENDRICKS

JOE HENDRICKS, Fifth Congressional District Representative, followed Bob Townsend on the speakers' list.

CANNON SPEAKS

Speaking of State representation, Representative CANNON said that with State issues that is the thing to do, represent the issues of your district and of Florida. "But," he said, "insofar as looking for economic stability, these United States are my bounds."

All citizens owe their allegiance to the Constitution of the United States. State constitutions control locally, but cannot supersede the Federal Constitution. Likewise, American citizens are citizens of the United States; to it they owe their allegiance, and from it they are entitled to security and protection. Pensions to the aged and to the blind should be paid equally, and in equal amount in every State in the Union. In practice of existing law, this is not being done. This grievous wrong must be righted.

CONTRIBUTIONS FROM WAGE EARNERS ARE TOO HEAVY

Under existing social-security retirement plan, contributions are made from wage earners up to $250 per month, beginning of course with a meager earning of, I believe, $200 per year. In some sections of this country, particularly in the farm areas, many wage earners do not obtain as much as $200 a year. What about his social-security retirement under the present law? Also, what about the man who is not employed during each year gainfully the required number of days, and who does not receive the required amount during each quarter? This man loses his contribution rights and also his retirement-benefit rights. Under the present plan of retirement at 65 years of age, it is indicated that 15 percent of those taxed will be returned nothing at all, since they failed to qualify. Another 15 percent will get the statutory minimum of the act, of $10 a month; and a good 40 percent more will receive under $19 per month. This last group will have a monthly average of about $14.50 per month. From this, it is apparent that more than half of those now contributing to old-age-pension retirement through their wages will get on an average of $14.50 per month retirement after they reach 65 years of age. The other 50 percent of contributors will receive monthly pensions of from, say, $19 up to $85 per month. A comparatively few will receive $85 per month because these will be the ones having paid in on monthly salaries of $250 per month.

THE RICH SHOULD PAY ALSO

Why should contributions stop on salaries of $250 per month and none be taxed on the higher salaries? This is all wrong. Regardless of the income and the salary of the individual the proportionate rate of payment should be made. Under actual operation of existing law those receiving the largest monthly payments will be those in the main who are already financially secure and who really do not need any Federal assistance, while the large majority of cases, those receiving the pittance of from $10 to $14.50 per month, will be the ones who are weak and insecure financially. My friends, again this is wrong.

The aged of our country should be adequately provided for and should share and share alike, in their old days, in Government pensions. Security of the aged is a Federal responsibility. Our Nation and our Government is as strong only as its citizens are. An economically secure and happy citizenship is the best assurance that our Nation can ever have prosperity and peace.

Under existing social-security law the large volume of payments and the burden of its operations come from those least able to pay. I favor social-security legislation which will exact a due and fair toll from those most able to pay rather than to continue to bleed the weak. H. R. 8264—the Townsend-plan bill—will equalize the burden of payments and security for our senior citizens. It exempts from tax small incomes up to $250 per month; thence upward, a 2-percent gross income tax is levied and inexpensively collected. It is believed that the return from this source will give reasonable pensions to citizens who are 60 years of age and above. It is also believed that as prosperity increases the amount of money received will likewise increase and that the participants in this retirement plan will receive adequate pensions. The plan as offered in this bill is reasonable and workable and will give security and help for the aged. It is a pay-as-you-go plan.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. I yield.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I would like to ask my colleague one or two questions. Does the gentleman from Florida believe that Florida will ever be able to take advantage of the provision of the present social-security law?

In other words, will we ever be able to match the present $20 that the Federal Government will put up to pension the aged people of Florida?

Mr. GREEN. It looks very doubtful, I will say to my colleague. We have available to us now in Florida from the Federal Government $20 per month, but Florida is not matching it. The legislature, through its tax-gathering sources, so far has not put up enough to match it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I believe the gentleman will agree with me that we have, in comparison with the number of people we have in the State of Florida, a larger percentage of old people than any other State in the Union, owing to the fact that they come there from other States to spend the last days of their lives.

Mr. GREEN. The gentleman is entirely correct.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wonder if the gentleman could tell me the average pension that is being paid to the old people of the State of Florida today?

Mr. GREEN. I have the impression that the average is around $11 a month for the small percentage who are participating at all in our State.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I believe that is correct according to the last report of the welfare board, but I understand the amount is now even less, and that the pension ranges from $5 up to as high as $20, or a little more in various counties.

Now, I want to say that I have had the pleasure of observing the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN] ever since he has been a Member from Florida. I know he is vitally interested in the welfare not only of the old people of the State, but the little fellow, and he has ably represented all of his constitutents. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN. I thank my colleague.

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. I yield.

Mr. HARRINGTON. Does this bill replace the bill introduced by your colleague from Florida [Mr. HENDRICKS]?

Mr. GREEN. That is correct—H. R. 8264, known as the Townsend-plan bill, takes the place of the Hendricks bill of the last session.

Mr. HARRINGTON. I understand that the bill has a new tax base, from which the money will be raised, which is a scientific arrangement.

Mr. GREEN. The gentleman is correct. It provides for a gross income tax on incomes of $250 a month and above.

Mr. HARRINGTON. In the other bill introduced by your distinguished colleague [Mr. HENDRICKS] what was the basis of the tax in that bill?

Mr. GREEN. It was a straight transaction tax. Another advantage about the new bill, I would say, exempts labor and the man of smaller earnings from having to make contribution.

Mr. HARRINGTON. But under the former bill which was considered by the House that was not done?

Mr. GREEN. It certainly was not. Everybody had to contribute, whether he was a charity recipient or what not.

Mr. HARRINGTON. As I understand the new bill, it does exempt the laborer?

Mr. GREEN. It does exempt everybody with earnings under $250 a month.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Will my colleague yield further?

Mr. GREEN. I yield.

Mr. HENDRICKS. In answer to some of the questions raised by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HARRINGTON] we tried to take advantage of all the criticisms leveled at this bill before the Ways and Means Committee and on the floor of the House, and make a much better bill, which I am sure we have, from the reaction I have received not only from Members of the House, but from my constituents and people all over the country.

Mr. GREEN. Indeed it is a much better bill. In fact I consider this bill as a workable, just, fair, and equitable bill. I commend it to the favorable consideration of my colleagues. [Applause.]

The large salaries and incomes of individuals should appropriately be taxed to help take care of the needy. These incomes are more enormous than one would casually believe. Recently the Treasury Department made public names of those who receive more than $75,000 per year. The fabulous incomes of such individuals as Henry Ford and John D. Rockefeller are not included, but included are a few which are considered by the ultrarich as modest incomes; for instance, Thomas J. Watson, head of International Business Machines Corporation, with $453,440; that was for 1938. This same year motion-picture actress Claudette Colbert pulled down an income of $301,944, and Louis B. Mayer, M-G-M head, in 1937 drew a salary of $1,161,753. Bing Crosby crooned out $260,000, and even little Shirley Temple was paid $114,848. Charles B. Dulcan, Sr., director of Hecht Co. Department Store, Washington, D. C., received the modest sum of $101,309. William Randolph Hearst, the great publisher, drew $500,000 in 1937. George Washington Hill, of the American Tobacco Co., obtained $380,976 in 1938 and almost as much in 1937, and probably a great deal more in 1939, as the past year was a much better business year than 1938, and, mind you, during the past year of 1939 the tobacco growers in my district hardly obtained cost of production of the tobacco. The price of cigarettes, chewing tobacco, and snuff remained the same or even more during this bad sales period of 1939. W. S. Knudsen, of General Motors, was paid $303,400; Walter P. Chrysler, of Chrysler Motors, $189,136; and Winthrop Aldrich, of the Chase National Bank, New York City, in 1938 was paid $177,600; Owen D. Young, General Electric Corporation, drew the handsome salary of $245,447. Why, H. F. Sinclair, of Consolidated Oil Co., drew $200,550 in 1938.

It is only fair and just and in the interest of better life in America that these huge salaries and incomes should bear their part toward giving the necessities of life and security to the aged of this country, and I shall never cease my efforts nor lay down my weapons until the aged and needy of this Nation are cared for.

PAY AS YOU GO

With the large Federal expenditures now required, and also a deficit in the Federal Treasury, it is indeed appropriate to have security for the aged on a pay-as-you-go basis. It would occur to me that any individual or organization receiving more than $250 per month would be willing to give 2 percent for the security of the aged and less fortunate. The earning possibilities of these who pay this 2-percent income tax will be substantially enhanced. The huge sums of money in this manner paid to the senior citizens of our country will rapidly develop into springs of increased purchasing power and flow rapidly into streams of ever-increasing prosperity. This increased demand for manufactured goods will cause the factories to call at the sources of production for raw material, then call for additional factory hands, and thousands of additional employees for distribution and transfer. Increased production will be assured.

UNDERCONSUMPTION—NOT OVERPRODUCTION

I doubt that our Nation has suffered from overproduction. It is my belief that it has been a matter of underconsumption. The funds flowing out through the operation of this law will give the added purchasing power which will enable consumption of existing surplus production, and make demand for an ever-increasing production. Employment left by our senior citizens will be taken up by younger persons who are more able to work and who are filled with the American inherent desire to be self-sustaining and independent. It is obvious that the operation of this law will make absolutely unnecessary huge Federal funds which are now of necessity being appropriated for the relief of the unemployed.

EMPLOYMENT IS CRYING NEED

Idleness is conducive to wrongdoing. Employment is the crying need for some ten or eleven million American citizens today. With their employment crime will wane, and with the returning of prosperity, better living will come and more noble citizenship will be achieved. [Applause.]

H. R. 8264 follows:

A bill to provide for national recovery by raising revenue and retiring citizens past 60 years of age from gainful employment and provide for the general welfare of all the people of the United States, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the "General Welfare Act."

SECTION 301. There is hereby created an account in the Treasury of the United States to be known as the General Welfare Account (hereinafter referred to as the "account"). There are hereby authorized to be appropriated annually amounts to be equal to the estimated revenue derived under title I of this act. On the twentieth day of the month succeeding the month in which this act is enacted, and on the twentieth day of each calendar month thereafter, there shall be credited to the account an amount equal to the amount of revenue to be collected under the provisions of such title as indicated by the returns filed during the preceding calendar month. Such amounts shall be available for making the payments as hereinafter provided. The Secretary of the Treasury shall submit annually to the Bureau of the Budget an estimate of the appropriations to be credited to the account.

Amounts estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury to be necessary for monthly expenditures in the administration of this title shall be deducted from amounts credited to the account each month. No annuitant shall support an able-bodied person in idleness except a spouse. No annuity shall be paid to any person for any period that such person is forcibly confined in a penal institution or an institution for mental incompetents, and no person shall be entitled to any annuity while so confined, or until a new application is approved for him after his release.

(d) Any annuitant may waive all or any part of his right to an annuity under this title by filing a notice thereof with the Secretary of the Treasury in such manner as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 1940

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth them that fear him; for He knoweth our frame, He remembereth that we are dust.

To this conclusion may we come with our trembling faith; Thou hast loved us and wilt love us unto the end. That life, so sacrificial that it reached the summit of the cross is too holy to be forgotten; it must continue and be relived until the consummation of the world. We pray Thee that the hands that were laid on the heads of little children and washed the disciples' feet will yet inspire the works of man until they reach the divine. When in the throes of difficulty, may we not elude it; let it shake the soul and let the glory out. Oh, happy is he who, with a calm mood and wise vision, sees Thy guaranty for the destiny of man in an ordered world; happier is he who sees the divine purpose beyond the shadows, that creation itself shall be delivered from the bondage and corruption into the glory of the liberty of the children of God. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Frazier, its legislative clerk, announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7270) entitled "An act to amend the Bonneville Project Act."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 8319. An act making appropriations for the Departments of State, Commerce, and Justice and for the judiciary, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, and for other purposes.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to include two brief editorials from the Washington Daily News of February 23.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a report made by the Honorable C. M. Evans on farm tenancy.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Friday next after the disposition of business on the Speaker's table and the legislative business of the day I may be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW

Mr. JOHNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNS. Mr. Speaker, I rise at this time to call attention to the birth of a great poet in this country in 1807, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. He was a favorite poet of mine. I remember as a young man in school especially his Village Blacksmith:

> Under a spreading chestnut tree
> The village smithy stands;
> The smith, a mighty man is he,
> With large and sinewy hands;
> And the muscles of his brawny arms
> Are strong as iron bands.

I remember, too, that solemn poem, A Rainy Day:

> The day is cold, and dark, and dreary;
> It rains, and the wind is never weary;
> The vine still clings to the moldering wall,
> But at every gust the dead leaves fall,
> And the day is dark and dreary.

Whoever has visited his home in Portland, Maine, has seen that vine on the wall there. A visit to this shrine is an inspiration to any man or woman and especially to any child who is studying Longfellow in school.

[Here the gavel fell.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold the point of order for a moment?

Mr. HINSHAW. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein the acts of Congress relating to the relief of suffering and distress abroad from 1912 to the present time. This is of particular importance at this time in view of the hearings going on in the Committee on Foreign Affairs relative to relief for the unfortunate people of Poland.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks and to include therein a short article with reference to the steel industry.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 30 seconds.

The SPEAKER. A point of order has been made that a quorum is not present.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from California withhold making the point of order to permit me to submit this request?

Mr. HINSHAW. I withhold the point of order for that purpose, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for 30 seconds.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House to a few lines of the poem, a part of which the gentleman from Wisconsin has just quoted. The words to which I refer are these:

> Each morning sees some task begun,
> Each evening sees it close;
> Something attempted, something done,
> Has earned a night's repose.

Which brings me to the thought that, although for more than 2 years the people have been demanding with an ever-increasing intensity the amendment of the National Labor Relations Act and the disciplining of the National Labor Relations Board, each morning sees us with the task not even begun.

Why cannot this House emulate the village blacksmith?

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Speaker, I renew my point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Obviously a quorum is not present.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HARTER]?

WAR DEPARTMENT CIVIL FUNCTIONS APPROPRIATION BILL, 1941

Mr. SNYDER, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported the bill (H. R. 8668) making appropriations for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1941, for civil functions administered by the War Department, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 1681), which was read a first and second time and, with the accompanying report, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TABER reserved all points of order against the bill.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow, after the disposition of matters on the Speaker's table and the legislative business of the day and at the conclusion of the address of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH], I may be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN]?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the program going to be tomorrow and what time do you expect to get through?

Mr. RANKIN. I do not know. I would say to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts that I hope it will be early because the gentleman from Pennsylvania and I have some very important business touching the lives of 130,000,000 people.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I wonder if the majority leader can tell us about tomorrow's program?

Mr. RAYBURN. Calendar Wednesday's business will be dispensed with, and the appropriation bill having to do with the civil functions of the War Department will be taken up.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Is that highly controversial?

Mr. RAYBURN. When appropriation bills are reported, it is always stated to me that there is nothing controversial in them, but before the day is over they get very controversial.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. If the consideration of the bill should not be completed before 7 or 8 o'clock in the evening, much as we would like to hear the gentleman from Mississippi, I do not think we should be compelled to stay.

Mr. RAYBURN. We are going to discuss a matter that affects 27,000,000 electric light and power consumers, and we do not require the presence of all Members here. We would like to have you all here, especially those who need light, but if you do not want to stay that will be satisfactory to us.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I say to the gentleman from Mississippi, since he mentioned my name, I would like to have all of the membership of the House here, because I am going to show that the statements he has made in reference to the Potomac Electric Co. are just about the most ridiculous statements I have ever heard made about any financial institution, and I am not interested in the Potomac Power Co., any more than the fact that I want to see justice done that concern as well as others.

Mr. RANKIN. The gentleman is wrong again, as usual.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN]?

There was no objection.

ABOLISHMENT OF NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX]?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, it occurs to me that we have about reached the point where we should proceed to liquidate the National Labor Relations Board and amend the law which that agency is using to destroy business and outrage justice. [Applause.] No free country can long live under the kind of administration this Board has given us. The Smith committee investigating the Board has painted a picture, using the Board's own brush, that should stir the wrath of everybody who loves justice and fair play. The Board should go, and with it its Witts, which means practically its entire personnel. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein a letter from the National League of Wholesale Fresh Fruit and Vegetable Distributors in opposition to the omnibus transportation bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

INCREASING THE LENDING AUTHORITY OF THE EXPORT-IMPORT BANK OF WASHINGTON

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 398 for immediate consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 398

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 3069, an act to provide for increasing the lending authority of the Export-Import Bank of Washington, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the act and shall continue not to exceed 4 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the act shall be read for amendments under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the act for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the act and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I presume the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] desires part of the time on the rule. I yield the gentleman 30 minutes after I shall have concluded in 15 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution makes in order what is known, due to the publicity given it by the press, as the Finn aid or Finnish relief bill, but it is, moreover, a bill to aid commerce, agriculture, and employment in the United States. I need not remind gentlemen of the House of the sympathetic disposition of most of the enlightened peoples of the world for heroic Finland, but those brave people cannot endure on sympathy alone. They need and should receive material assistance, such as is contemplated by the pending bill. The rule provides for 4 hours of general debate. It is a broad and liberal rule. After the debate has been concluded, the bill will be considered under the 5-minute rule for amendments; therefore, surely not even the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] will be able to plausibly charge that it is a harsh or a gag rule.

I am indeed pleased to be able to report this rule, and I want to say that the rule has been reported in actuality unanimously, notwithstanding the fact that some witnesses and Members who appeared before the Committee on Rules differed with some of the provisions in the bill. It is amazing to me that some of the very men who from time to time unfairly and unjustly charged that the Neutrality Act and the President's actions were bound to involve us in war now are opposed to the restrictive amendments adopted by the House Committee on Banking and Currency. The House should be grateful, as I am sure it is, to that great committee for embodying these two restrictive amendments in the Senate bill. The aim of those amendments is to preclude successfully charging the United States with violating the Neutrality Act and to avoid any complaint by any nation that we have not been neutral in this matter.

You recall that last session, with scarcely any opposition, we authorized an increase from $100,000,000 to $200,000,000 for the Export-Import Bank, the same as this bill provides. The bill, S. 3069, as amended by the House Banking and Currency Committee, provides, also:

That the aggregate amount of loans to any foreign country and the agencies and nationals thereof which are hereafter authorized to be made and are outstanding at any one time shall not exceed $20,000,000, and such amount shall be in addition to the amount of loans heretofore authorized or made to such foreign country and the agencies and nationals thereof: Provided further, That the Export-Import Bank of Washington shall not make any loans to any government which was in default in the payment of its obligations or any part thereof to the Government of the United States on April 13, 1934, or in violation of international law as interpreted by the Department of State, or for the purchase of any articles, except aircraft exclusively, for commercial purposes, listed as arms, ammunition, or implements of war by the President of the United States in accordance with the Neutrality Act of 1939.

I had hoped we could dispose of this bill early. I had thought 2 hours of general debate would suffice. Unfortunately, however, some of the Republican Members desire more time. They are divided. Some of them desire a still broader bill to make possible larger loans, and others, who usually oppose anything and everything, regardless of how beneficial the legislation may be, will oppose it.

I shall not take up much more time now, but I wish to remind the membership of the House that Germany, Great Britain, France, and other nations have expended in the last 10 years millions and millions of dollars to extend their commerce. They have contact agencies in every nook and cranny of the world. They spend millions annually for this purpose. We had been, up to a few years ago, unable to cope with the solicitors of these foreign countries working in Central and South America, but we are making gratifying progress. The legislation that we enacted a few years ago has been helpful. I believe that if American manufacturers are in position to extend credit to purchasers from other nations we can increase our exports tremendously. I recall wondering, when I was in Cuba 33 years ago, why American manufacturers could not sell anything to the Cubans. The Cubans said, "Well, the Germans and others give us 6 months, 9 months, or a year's credit. America wants cash in hand. We do not have it, and we cannot buy from America, but we would like to."

This legislation will tremendously aid manufacturers who are broad- and liberal-minded and desire to extend their business to do so, if they can get financial assistance. It is said there is $47,000,000,000 on deposit in our banks. Yes; we have that much, but, unfortunately, somehow or other, the banks will not, for hidden reasons, loan money for commercial or agricultural purposes.

It is for that reason that we have given additional power to the R. F. C. and the Federal Reserve Board and empowered this bank to help the commerce and industry of the United States. This is not only a Finnish bill, but, as I have stated, a bill in the interest of extending our commerce throughout the world, and therefore I hope that the resolution, as well as the bill itself, will be adopted without undue debate. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 15 minutes.

Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] has said, this is a fair rule. It provides for 4 hours of general debate, and 1 hour on the rule.

For some reason or other I have been quoted in the press, and particularly this morning in two Washington newspapers, as having sought to delay consideration of the Finnish loan for 2 or 3 weeks. I did delay it from Monday until Tuesday, which is 24 hours, because, instead of having 3 hours' general debate, I sought 6 hours of debate, and we compromised on 5 hours, and as a member of the Rules Committee I am perfectly satisfied with the procedure and with the rule.

I am for a loan to Finland of $20,000,000 in addition to the $10,000,000 already granted by the Export-Import Bank. I propose to offer that amendment at the proper time in the consideration of the bill. The bill does not specify any amount that should go to Finland. It provides for an increase of $100,000,000 to be turned over to the Export-Import Bank to make any loans it may desire throughout the world under certain limitations written into the bill.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. COLMER. As a matter of fact, there is no provision made at all for a loan to Finland in this bill and under the terms of the bill Finland may not be granted any loan at all.

Mr. FISH. That is correct.

I am not a mind reader, and I cannot say exactly what the American people want us to do——

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. TABER. I have tried to get a copy of the hearings upon which this bill was reported, and I am told there is none available. Does the gentleman think that is the way to report such a bill to the House?

Mr. FISH. No; I think that is a very unfortunate procedure.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. The gentleman sitting next to the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] has a copy that he might, under certain circumstances, let the gentleman look at.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. The copies are available.

Mr. TABER. Why do they not let us have them?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. I do not know about that, but they have been printed.

Mr. FISH. I am quite sure, I will say to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WILLIAMS], there is no idea on his part or on the part of his committee or any member of his committee to cover up the hearings. There is nothing in those hearings that should not be made public, and I am sure that there is no desire on his part to do so, but I do not understand why the committee print should be marked "Confidential."

I am not a mind reader, but I have very good reason to believe that the American people are not only sympathetic toward Finland but desire this Congress to make a loan of at least $20,000,000 to the Finnish Republic in addition to the $10,000,000 that has already been made by the Export-Import Bank. I am not at all sure that the American public wants the Congress of the United States to continue to delegate and surrender its power over the purse strings and turn $100,000,000 over to some subordinate agency of the Government to make indiscriminate loans to foreign nations without the approval of Congress and possibly involve us in foreign difficulties and war.

I have already made up my mind that we can make a loan directly to Finland without jeopardizing the peace of the United States, and I will say to my Democratic friends—and I use the word "friends" in this instance advisedly, because that seems to be democratic terminology—that for many years I have not been in accord either with the acts or the speeches of President Roosevelt. However, I endorse the speech the President made to the American Youth Congress recently here in Washington, when he said to that Youth Congress that he favored a loan to Finland and that Soviet Russia was the aggressor nation, and then went on to say that it was an absurdity and utterly ridiculous to try to claim that if we made such a loan to Finland it would involve us in war with Soviet Russia.

I endorse every word the President said in that respect, and practically in his entire speech. It is the best speech the President has made for years. [Applause.] It was a real American speech.

There is no principle of international law that could be violated by making a loan to Finland directly. If I were able to do so within the confines of this bill and under parliamentary procedure, I would even be glad to offer an amendment making a direct gift to Finland of $20,000,000, but I do not believe that would be possible under the rules. However, I do propose to offer and ask the Members to vote for a loan of $20,000,000 for the Republic of Finland.

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield.

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman mean an unrestricted loan which may be used for whatever purposes the Finnish Government may wish?

Mr. FISH. Well, they have already written into the bill certain restrictions on arms, ammunition, and implements of war; and I do not believe, in fairness to the gentleman, you could take it out in the House, because there are those who might think it would in some way involve our American neutrality. I would like to make it a gift, but as that is impossible, I intend to offer an amendment providing for twenty millions instead of one hundred millions and earmarking the increase as a loan for Finland.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. DONDERO. I have just tried to obtain a copy of the hearings and have been informed that they are not available, and will not be available until after they have been revised. Under this bill can a loan be made to Russia or to Japan?

Mr. FISH. No; not to Russia under this bill, because under the restriction now in the bill loans cannot be made to any country that has defaulted in its debt to the United States, and that would include Russia but not Japan.

Mr. DONDERO. After April 13, 1934?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Here is what troubles me. The first proviso on page 1, with reference to the limitation on the loans to any one country, to wit, $20,000,000, refers to loans to any one country or agencies and nationals thereof. However, proviso No. 2, on page 2, prohibiting the loans to foreign governments in default restricts the prohibition only to the governments and permits the loans to individuals and agencies of the governments which are in default. It is a pretty finely camouflaged bill.

Mr. FISH. That may be, but I have the utmost confidence in the administrator higher up regarding these loans. I refer to Federal Loan Administrator Jesse Jones. No one can question his honesty, his integrity, or his ability. He is as careful and as shrewd as a Yankee trader, and so far he has looked after the interests of the American people in all these loans with much credit and distinction, and in my humble opinion Mr. Jesse Jones is an outstanding public official and a great administrator. [Applause.] If I may be permitted the temerity to suggest it, I think he is the best qualified man on his experience and record in the Democratic Party to be its candidate for President of the United States. Jesse Jones knows about the value of money and how to look after it and has a definite record for making sound loans and has had for a number of years and knows that money does not grow on trees but comes out of the pockets of the American people.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. I notice that the press announced this morning that Finland placed an order in the United States for ammunition to the extent of $5,000,000. How can we enforce this prohibition in the bill if Finland places an order of this character and substitutes one form of money for another form of money?

Mr. FISH. Finland has a right under international law to buy all the arms she wants from America. Finland, under international law, is not at war. Russia specifically says that she is not at war with Finland. Furthermore, neither the President of the United States nor the Congress has recognized a state of war. Therefore Finland can, out of relief money she gets from other sources or with her own resources, buy arms and ammunition in America without violating international law.

Mr. CELLER. Then is not that prohibition utterly useless?

Mr. FISH. No; because this money will buy foodstuffs, clothing, medical supplies, gasoline, motor trucks, copper, lead, everything she wants except arms, ammunition, and implements of war, and I think that is why it was written into the bill, because I think Congress wants it that way, and possibly the American people.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Yes.

Mr. DONDERO. Can the gentleman inform the House how much money Finland has received from private sources?

Mr. FISH. It would take a little time. Finland has received from the Hoover relief committee upward of $2,000,000, probably nearer $3,000,000, at the present time, but she has received large contributions from foreign nations. Finland has received from Sweden alone, a small, but a rather rich country, one of the richest countries of its size in Europe, in donations, $25,000,000, and $75,000,000 in supplies, showing that what we propose to do by loaning Finland twenty millions is not overgenerous for the greatest and richest country in the world. I believe Argentina and Canada have given large amounts of wheat and Brazil of coffee.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Is not it true that Finland has been receiving money from General Ryan's committee to purchase military supplies?

Mr. FISH. Certainly. Mr. Speaker, I want now to make my own position clear, and that of others who think as I do for keeping American out of war. I am an isolationist from war, from all foreign wars, but not an isolationist from peace or limitation of armament, or promoting peace throughout the world or affording relief on humanitarian grounds. Therefore, before I decided to vote for the Finnish loan I analyzed the situation as far as I was able, and came to the definite conclusion that if we make a loan, or even a direct gift, it could not possibly involve us in war with Soviet Russia.

I happen to have been in Finland this year. As you all know now, it is a small, highly democratic, comparatively poor, but a great peace-loving country, and a particular friend of the United States. It is the one nation in the world that has paid its war debts to us. That is not the reason, however, that controls my decision to vote for a Finnish relief bill. I am convinced that Finland today is fighting the battle of democracy, Christianity, and civilization against the threat of communism. [Applause.] There should be no use pussyfooting or shadow boxing about this issue. It is not because Finland has paid its debt to us; it is not because we like Finland; but it is because we know, and the American people know, that Finland is fighting a heroic battle against the spread of communism, and we, the American people, know that Soviet Russia has made a brutal, ruthless, and unprovoked attack on Finland, a peace-loving country. There has not been a more dastardly, abominable, or treacherous attack in recent history than the aggression of the Red Army on the little Republic of Finland.

So it is not only a question of our sentiments being on the side of Finland, but the people back home want us to furnish foodstuffs and nonmilitary supplies, and thereby help

Finland defend its liberties, its independence, and its freedom against communism and the "red" army of the Soviet dictator.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I am sorry, but my time is too limited.

There was an old song that ran something like this, "Stop Kicking My Dog Around."

Mr. CULLEN. Hounddog?

Mr. FISH. "Stop Kicking My Hound Dog Around."

Mr. CULLEN. As quoted by Mr. BENNETT CLARK.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. It makes no difference if he is a hound. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. FISH. Well, paraphrasing that song, is it not time that the Congress stopped kicking the Constitution around and making a scrap of paper out of the Constitution of the United States? We are continually, by our votes, kicking the slats right out of the Constitution, one by one, and when is it going to end? Will there be any Constitution left? Will there be any Congress left if we continue this procedure? Has the flame of constitutional liberty sunk so low that the Congress of the United States will continue to delegate away and surrender its constitutional power to control the purse strings? Only the other day—and I am not saying that these trade treaties are not well administered—in discussing the merits and demerits of the trade treaty, we deliberately, by our votes, delegated away and surrendered our power to initiate revenue legislation, and to lay and collect taxes, the most important powers and legislative functions of the House of Representatives. Today it is proposed to turn over $100,000,000, the control of the purse strings, to some subordinate agency of the Government to make loans for us to foreign nations. Why should we turn over our constitutional power to some subordinate, and bureaucratic agency of the Government whose officials were never elected by the people, and again surrender one of the mightiest powers of the Congress of the United States? I am opposed to this delegation of power.

In the first instance, the Export-Import Bank was erected to do what? To make loans to Soviet Russia. It was put over in the Congress. The Congress did not know it, but that was the original purpose for it. It went through, but no loans were made, and it finally practically died. A few years ago we made an authorization of $100,000,000, and it was generally understood at that time that the money was to go for the purpose of increasing our trade with South America. I am a Pan American. I believe we should try to develop and increase our trade with South America, particularly now when England and Germany are busy fighting, but they have changed the whole proposition, evidently for the purpose of making loans in the European war zones—not for trade, but as quasi war loans.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Now it is proposed to turn over an additional $100,000,000, using that money to make loans practically for war purposes to foreign nations abroad—not in South America at all and generally not for trade, but for the purpose of helping those nations in their difficulties abroad and possibly financing future wars.

I admit—and I do not apologize for being for the Finnish loan—I want to vote for that loan separately by an amendment to this bill. I am opposed to continuing to delegate control of the purse strings to any subordinate agency. I am opposed to turning over to any subordinate of this Government the power to write our foreign policies. And that is exactly what we are doing. We are surrendering to one or two or three people in the Government not only control over huge sums of money but control in shaping our foreign policies that might involve us in war.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. Therefore, I say, has not the time come to stop kicking the Constitution around? Is there not some limit to surrendering the rights of Congress and the rights and constitutional powers of the House of Representatives? If we continue this procedure, will there be any House of Representatives left? Will there be any Congress left, and will there be any Constitution left? [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM].

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. GORE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I have only 5 minutes, and in that time I can barely intimate some of the thoughts I have in mind.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this resolution and of the purpose of the measure which its adoption will make in order for our consideration.

President Roosevelt made the statement recently that 98 percent of the American people are sympathetic with Finland in its struggle. The surprising thing to me is that 2 percent of our people may be of a contrary opinion. The great masses of the American people, in keeping with our history, our tradition, and the principles we cherish, will regard us as recreant to our duty if we do not give to the little country of Finland in every possible and proper way all the aid which can be extended without doing violence to our neutrality law. In this instance, by reason of our previous action, the question of neutrality does not arise.

Finland is a small nation, fighting against overwhelming odds for the preservation of the freedom of body, the freedom of mind, the freedom of property, the freedom of religion—rights very near and dear to the American heart and character.

In the annals of our history we find two struggles analogous in many respects to that now raging in that little land. One was our struggle for independence from the mother country in the American Revolution. The odds were against us in that conflict, but others came gloriously to our aid. We all recall the rigors of Valley Forge and the hardships and handicaps inflicted upon the American soldiers through a niggardly Congress that did not appropriate funds necessary even for their proper sustenance. Valley Forge in its physical aspects has been repeated many times in Finland, and under conditions perhaps more rigorous.

The other struggle which seems to me so distinctly analogous is that which occurred in the State in which I live, the struggle of the small Republic of Texas, also against overwhelming odds, against the oppression of Mexico. And in that conflict we had as a wonderful heritage for Americans forever the matchless incident of the Alamo. I wonder if within the last day or two this small struggling band in Finland has not had at Koivisto its Alamo.

Valley Forge and the Alamo were the forerunners of victory. Let us hope and let us pray that as history has repeated itself in duplicating them in Finland they may also be the heralds of triumph of the liberty which they crave and which we as Americans cherish. [Applause.]

Surely in view of our history, our ideas, and our ideals Finland has the right to expect from us and to expect as promptly as possible any aid which we may render in keeping with our laws and without involving us in a European war. Though the money here provided may not be used for arms and ammunition, there are things which may be purchased quite as necessary for sustenance, quite as necessary for carrying on the conflict as arms and munitions and the things ordinarily on the roster of materials of war.

Mr. Speaker, they have waited a long time and fought valiantly, sustained by an unfaltering faith. Perhaps we have been a little tardy in extending the aid we should. The Scriptures say that hope deferred maketh the heart sick. I hope that from our hearts and from our means we may give this very reasonable aid to those who are fighting for principles that we as Americans hope may endure in this land of ours and in all the nations under God's blue heaven. [Applause.]

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I do hope that this bill will pass and the vote will be very substantially favorable to its passage. I do likewise hope that we shall strike from the bill the prohibition with reference to military supplies. I cannot conceive, in the first place, how that provision can be made effective.

I am informed that a Finnish Legation official yesterday indicated that his country had either requested or had placed orders for a large quantity of machine guns, antiaircraft guns, and ammunition. The purchase was up to $5,000,000.

I again ask, How can the prohibition against the purchase, with the contemplated loan to Finland, of this ammunition or implements of war be effectively carried out? If Finland will purchase in this country with the contemplated loan nonmilitary supplies, there will then be released other moneys in the control of Finland which it had originally intended for nonmilitary supplies to be used for the purchase of military supplies either here or in other countries. Furthermore, Finland could very readily use the articles which it purchases out of the proceeds of the loan for purposes of barter in other countries to secure in such other countries arms and ammunition.

In the second place, I am assured by the Department of Commerce that 98 percent of all the materials purchased in this country by Russia, the enemy of Finland, has been for military supplies. On the one hand, therefore, we grant Russia the very thing that we deny Finland by this bill.

Stalin has been buying from us in vast quantities raw copper, scrap iron, molybdenum—an alloy of steel—electrical machinery and apparatus, brass, bronze, metal-working machinery, aluminum, as well as processed rubber, tin, copper, and other raw materials. Herewith set forth are the detailed statistics from the Department of Commerce:

[1] Less than $500.

Does it not seem anomalous that we deny to courageous Finland the very articles that strengthen Stalin in his battle against Finland? There is a steady and growing stream of ships flying the flags of neutral countries, and even American flags, carrying copper ore, copper concentrates, and finished forms of copper, as well as other industrial and technical material to Vladivostok. These ships sail from New York, Baltimore, San Pedro, Seattle, and Takoma. Much of the cargo is shipped to Manzanillo, Mexico. Into Manzanillo come the ships flying the hammer and sickle, and these Stalin ships take in the cargo, unloaded at Manzanillo, from those ships that cannot or will not make the long crossing to the coast of Siberia, whence this war material is shipped across to Russia.

In the beginning of this month the Russian freighter Kim discharged $5,600,000 in gold bullion at San Francisco. This was done to replenish the Soviet balances in this country. The money was credited to Stalin's account in the Chase National Bank and will pay for the bulk cargo of war materials that the Kim will take back to Siberia.

During the month of January at least 20 ships left the Tacoma docks for direct sailing to Russia or Siberia. They were loaded with the smelting products gotten from plants at Tacoma. All of these products were for military purposes.

How can we in good conscience sell to one nation military supplies and not to the other?

Those who are insisting upon limitations as to the use of funds were not heard when we made a loan to China of $25,000,000 through our Export-Import Bank. No peep was then heard from anyone. I fail to see any distinction between the loan to China in connection with the undeclared war with Japan and a loan to Finland in connection with the undeclared war with Russia. Both situations are on a parity.

We should not remain indifferent to the plight of plucky little Finland. The sympathy of well-thinking Americans for that country is equaled only by their antipathy for Stalin. Because of that sympathy and antipathy, we should loan Finland $20,000,000 to enable her to buy airplanes, ammunition, and all manner and kind of war materials, thus making it possible for her to protect the Mannerheim line and to hurl back the Stalin legions.

We have been thoroughly amazed at the prowess of the Finnish troops and their victories along Lake Ladoga. But they can readily lose more than they can gain before the ice begins to thin. If the Finns lose, it will be a dreadful loss also to the Swedes, the Norwegians, the French, the English, and, yes, even to the Americans, because it will be a dreadful blow to democracy.

As to the limitation and prohibition against the purchase of arms and ammunition, a Finnish woman said: "We can't throw cabbages at the Bolshevists, and if we did, they would only pick them up and eat them." The Finns ask for bullets, and we give them beans; they ask for powder, and we give them peas; they seek cannon, and they get broomsticks; they covet planes, and we send them pancakes.

We must aid Finland, and we must render that aid quickly. Delay in this Chamber is dangerous.

I have received numerous communications to the effect that instead of loaning money to Finland we should take care of those in our land who are unemployed and on relief. To those correspondents I would say that one thing has nothing to do with the other. A $20,000,000 loan to Finland is only a drop in the bucket. It would not affect relief one way or another. Remember, the Finns paid back practically all of the moneys loaned to her in the past. Moreover, we heard no such arguments against making a $25,000,000 loan to China or a $10,000,000 loan to Norway. Furthermore, loans have been authorized by the Export-Import Bank to Brazil, Chile, Argentina, Paraguay, and Panama. The public was informed of such authorizations. I never heard a whimper then that such loans would militate against relief. Sweden some time ago applied for a $25,000,000 loan. I never heard the faintest word against such loan or that it would militate against those on relief. It should be remembered that all these loans and credits must be used to buy American goods. Therefore, if the loans in question are to have any effect on relief, it will be an effect opposite that expressed by the objectors to the loan under discussion. For such loans necessarily increase the purchase of American goods and to that extent re-create American jobs.

In my humble opinion, we subscribe to international anarchy if we do not help poor and helpless Finland, and help her in the way that will do the most good. By refusing to help Finland, now a victim of Stalin aggression, and deliberately aiding the aggressor like Stalin by providing him with military supplies, we encourage the Nazi-Communist dictatorship victory over western European democracy. We cannot remain indifferent to that threat.

How ridiculous we make ourselves to put in this bill a prohibition precluding Finland from using the funds lent her to purchase such military supplies.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Is there not a distinction between the two countries? We did not lend Russia any money with which to buy those things.

Mr. CELLER. What difference fundamentally does that make? We are an ally of Russia as against Finland when we play into her hands and sell her that which we refuse Finland. For this reason I do indeed deplore the prohibition that has been placed in the bill.

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. BOLLES. I would like to stress that, while we are attempting to finance Finland, yet folding our arms against munitions, we have paid for the purchases by Russia with the profit they made on the gold they sold us.

Mr. CELLER. We sell munitions to Russia, a country that has not paid us one red copper of the millions of public and private debt she owes our country and our people, whereas we do not propose to sell these materials to Finland, a country which has responded like a major and paid with greatest sacrifice its debt to our country and our people. Finland, figuring all payments as principal and excluding all payments for interest, has paid $8,000,000 out of a total principal indebtedness of $9,000,000. Remember this, also: Finland has paid back $80,000,000 on bonds and other evidence of indebtedness held by Americans.

Let me ask you what Russia has done with the bonds held by private individuals. What about Stalin's public indebtedness to us? She has torn up her obligations. Finland, however, came forward and honorably, loyally, and courageously paid her private bondholders in this country. In the face of such attitude and honoring of obligations, our treatment of Finland today is shocking. I think it is dead wrong, and I hope this prohibition or restriction as to arms and military implements will be taken out of the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER].

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, a writer once said that what this country needed was more men in public life who, figuratively speaking, were able to sit on a cake of ice when emotion and sentiment were rampant throughout the land. This sentiment is especially applicable to those in public life when confronted by great national problems. I fear that our country is just outside the war zone in Europe today, and the big job we have is to keep away from that zone. Will loaning more money in Europe now help to get in or help to keep out?

The gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER], who just preceded me, has fought the war between Finland and Russia. His was the sentimental appeal entirely. God knows, we all sympathize with bleeding Finland, and I agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] when he states that 98 percent—it seems it must be 100 percent—of our people are in sympathy with Finland in this conflict. My friend from Texas made his usual convincing and appealing speech. He is so popular, so persuasive, and so human that it is very difficult to disagree with him. He described the Alamo and Valley Forge. He made it clear that Finland is fighting democracy's battles in Europe and concluded we could at least contribute our bit by authorizing a loan to Finland. I fear that that loan might be the first step to getting into the war.

Now, I am sure that I feel just as the gentleman from Texas feels about this matter up to the point of making loans in Europe at this time. I cannot divorce myself from the historic fact that the nations of Europe have been warring among themselves over territory, boundaries, trade, and what not for 2,000 years, and I cannot escape the conclusion that anything this country may do at this time will not change the European situation and bring about the rule of democracy, religion, brotherly love, and good-fellowship in the Old World. Those wars were going on over there when we were fighting for liberty in America. We carved out new homes from the American wilderness and set up a new form of government. We gave liberty and human rights new definitions, and it seems to me that the great mission of the United States in the world is to hold high the banner of liberty and to proclaim by example that a government of the people, by the people, and for the people can be maintained.

For my part, I believe that the most potential thing that we can do to guarantee this freedom and maintain civilization according to American standards is to keep out of the European troubles.

Sympathy and sentiment are a part of the make-up of all good people, yet sympathy and sentiment must not control our action at all times. There must be those who have the deliberation, the courage, and the inclination to think things through in times like these.

This proposed act is not a Finnish relief or loan bill. True, it has been so publicized and talked about throughout the country. Nothing is further from the truth. In short, this act simply doubles the capital stock of the Export-Import Bank. Existing law provides a revolving fund of $100,000,000 for the use of this bank. S. 3069, which we are to consider today, increases that amount to $200,000,000. There are some additional limitations imposed upon the bank as to loaning the money. Otherwise this proposed legislation is but a continuation of existing law.

Now this is not a political issue. Many different views are entertained by the Members. I do not fully agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], who is opposed to this bill but who would loan to Finland all the money it wants to borrow, or at least he would give to Finland, if necessary, any reasonable amount. Then there are those among us who feel so keenly in Finland's behalf that they would furnish any assistance required short of manpower. These Members are found among the Republicans and among the Democrats, so this is certainly not a party issue.

I plead guilty to having but little specific information concerning this bill because the printed hearings have not been made available to anyone excepting members of the Banking and Currency Committee. Five minutes ago I succeeded in getting a copy of the hearings which are confidential committee prints, and which have never been revised and released to the public. I have as much information, however, as other Members of the House other than those on the committee. When the members of the Banking and Currency Committee appeared before the Rules Committee asking that a rule be granted, I did learn some things about this legislation which I did not know before.

It was made clear in that hearing that the Export-Import Bank in the first instance was set up by an Executive order for the express purpose of making loans to Russia after our country had recognized Russia. Later the question of making loans to Cuba was involved, and finally the present law was enacted.

My understanding is that in the first place it was intended that this Government should make loans in this indirect manner to countries which we were prevented from loaning money to by the Johnson Act. You will recall the Johnson Act prevents the United States from making loans to governments in default on payments of debts owed to this country. I just do not like that kind of subterfuge. When the Export-Import Bank was authorized by law, the Congress did not intend, and the country did not intend, that our Government should circumvent the Johnson Act. After all, candor is the best policy in the long run.

This bill, S. 3069, can only be of assistance to Finland if those operating the bank so desire. Finland has already borrowed $8,000,000 through this bank, and, as I understand, $2,000,000 more will be released to Finland before this bill takes effect. Therefore, if this bill does become law, it would be possible to make an additional loan of $20,000,000 to Finland. On the other hand, we are informed—and I am advised that the hearings so state—that the Export-Import Bank has made certain commitments of funds now available and funds dependent upon the passage of this bill. Those commitments are to Norway, Sweden, and, if I am correctly advised, an application from Denmark is pending. Again, I understand that China is presumed to be given additional loans if this bill becomes law. Then we hear much talk about assisting our export trade in South America through the enactment of this proposed legislation. If these statements are true, then why spectacularize this proposal as "the Finnish loan bill"? Up to now anyone unfamiliar with the facts, and being advised only by the debate thus far had, could draw but one conclusion, and that is that we are considering a bill providing a loan for Finland and nothing more.

My sympathies are all with Finland, yet I feel that I would be derelict in my duty if I permitted emotion and that sympathy to run away with my deliberate judgment. Assuming that we pass this legislation and loan the $100,000,000 to Finland and the Scandinavian countries, and it soon becomes evident that that is not enough, will we abandon the policy, run out on our allies, and leave them to the mercy of the dictators in Europe, or will we follow up our sympathy and sentiment and back up our good intentions with enough money, enough force, and enough men, if need be, to settle these political and economic questions in the Old World?

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. I wonder if the gentleman is indirectly criticizing the French Government for the 35,000,000 livres they lent us in 1776?

Mr. MICHENER. That is sentiment again.

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. That is not sentiment. It is a fact.

Mr. MICHENER. Yes; the French Government was most helpful in 1776. The Lafayette Monument down on the Avenue is a constant reminder of this, yet I cannot bring myself to believe that, even though I recall the struggles of 1776 and Valley Forge and all the rest, American people want to let that sentiment control to the extent that we send our soldiers to Europe now or in the future to straighten out Old World quarrels, inequities, and injustices. Cannot we be of more assistance by making this country what the Statue of Liberty proclaims it to be? Can we not be of more assistance to humanity and the world by keeping our own house in order, setting a proper example, and being in a position to lead the way to better things when the war over yonder is finished?

Granted that the sentiment of the country today is that we should do something to help Finland, it seems to me that efforts like the Finnish relief movement, at the head of which is Mr. Hoover, are most commendable, and the thousands of dollars that are going from this country to Finland will be of inestimable assistance. Yet I am constrained to believe that these same people of ours do not want the Congress to do anything that might lead us into the European conflict.

Mr. EATON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICHENER. I yield to the distinguished doctor of divinity, the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. EATON. May I ask the gentleman if he does not consider that moral sentiment as expressed in this country is a fact to be taken into consideration when reasoning on this subject?

Mr. MICHENER. Of course, but the sinking of another Lusitania might put this country into the war at any time if momentary sentiment prevailed. We are in a position here where we must stop, look, and listen. We must give consideration to the facts before us and not be entirely controlled by sentiment. After we get into war it is too late to talk about keeping out.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. THOMAS F. FORD].

Mr. THOMAS. F. FORD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Michigan stated the amount of money that had been lent to Finland and the amount that would be available under this act, although Finland is not mentioned, amounted to $10,000,000. He said that $8,000,000 had been lent to that country and spent by it, which is true, and there are $2,000,000 additional available under that loan. I desire to correct the gentleman from Michigan. The passage of this act will permit the Export-Import Bank to lend Finland an additional $20,000,000 if in the opinion of the bank there is a possibility that the money might be returned. In this connection may I quote Mr. Jones. He was asked if he thought Finland would be able to pay the money and he replied:

> My judgment is that the lending of this money will not decide the war, and I do not believe the spirit of the Finnish people will be crushed. You might kill off some of this generation, but in my view there will be a Finnish people and probably a Finnish Government for a long time. They are an honorable people and will pay their debts.

Mr. Speaker, that is the statement of Jesse Jones, head of the lending institution of which the Export-Import Bank is a part. Mr. Speaker, in common with 98 or 99 percent of the American people I have great admiration for the Finnish people. I would like to help them in every way I can. But the fact of the matter is that while this bill has been called a Finnish-loan bill, the Finnish loan is merely an incident to it. It is as much of an incident to it as the loan that might be made to a concern in South America that wanted to buy railroad supplies in the United States and the Export-Import Bank lent them the money temporarily so they could buy those goods and thereby stimulate and develop and improve the export trade of the United States.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of the time on this side to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS].

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, we have the responsibility here of resolving two moral sentiments of our people that we know are in conflict. Our people are overwhelmingly with indomitable Finland in her fight against Russia, and at the same time our people are overwhelmingly against involvement in the European war. Finland needs arms and men immediately to carry on her fight. Will this bill give Finland the help she needs? No. Can our people help Finland fight without involving our Government and our neutrality? Yes. Can our Government help Finland fight without involving our Government and our neutrality? No.

Every American who wants to help Finland has a right to do it and a way to do it, and I have done it. I have contributed to the Finnish relief. I have contributed to fighting funds for Finland. I urge you to do the same thing. That is my personal affair and does not concern my Government.

On the other hand, every American who wants his Government to help Finland fight by using the sovereign power of our country to tax and borrow money, by making help to Finland a legal obligation of the taxpayer to the United States instead of a moral obligation to Finland, every American in or out of Congress who wants to help Finland in this way, I believe either has not thought the problem through or is willing to take a step toward our involvement in the European war.

Edwin Borchard, professor of law at Yale University, says:

> American sympathies for Finland may legitimately be expressed in private contributions to the Hoover committee or any other private donation. A governmental loan to Finland, whether through the Export-Import Bank or the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, is an act of intervention and of war, exposing the United States to legitimate reprisals now or hereafter, on the part of Soviet Russia. It therefore seems to me illegal and dangerous, however tempting, to advance public funds to Finland.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ALLEN of Illinois. Does not the gentleman believe it is ridiculous for this country to be lending money to all the countries in the world when we cannot even pay our own bills in our own country?

Mr. VORYS of Ohio. Yes. Furthermore, I believe this is a pusillanimous way to go about helping Finland and a pusillanimous way to go about extending the lending authority of the Export-Import Bank. For the sake of Finland we are to help exporters to South America. To help Finland fight we are to give Jesse Jones the power to let Americans buy $20,000,000 worth of stuff that Finland does not need for fighting. For the sake of Finland we are to pass a lend-spend measure that we turned down last summer when it was here on its own merits. Remember, this bill does not mention Finland; Jesse Jones has not promised to lend Finland twenty millions or any other amount.

Suppose, however, we consider this as a Finnish loan. As a business loan it is inexcusably unsound. To pretend that Finland, almost overwhelmed by Russia, is a good business risk because she has been paying on her debts is just like selling life insurance to a man with pneumonia because he used to be in sound health. [Applause.]

As a military loan this is inexcusably futile—not enough to guarantee victory, not for a purpose that will even aid resistance—Finland cannot buy military supplies with this loan.

As a humanitarian loan this is inexcusably cruel, for we encourage a bloody resistance that we are not willing to support.

As a diplomatic loan this is inexcusably stupid. We will not stop undeclared wars by this craven policy of making undeclared loans. This is not a diplomatic threat unless Russia decides we do not know what we are doing or that we do not mean what we say, and that we are embarking upon a policy of financing the resistance of all neutrals either without knowing it or without admitting it.

We can save Finland. All we have to do is to send our fleet and our Army and our planes, backed by our resources, into the battle against Russia. We can make a great unrestricted loan to Finland, and the Finns will pay us back, if we guarantee their continued existence by the force of our armed power. But we will not do it; why? Because this is not our war.

We do not have to be neutral. We have a right to take sides, but we have a duty to ourselves and to the world not to try to do both at once—go in and stay out. We are not afraid of Russia. We are not afraid of offending Russia, but we have a duty to Finland and to ourselves, regardless of Russia, of honesty, and candor, and fair dealing. You do not treat a man fairly just because you are afraid of him. You have no right to cheat a man just because you do not like him. International law is just like that.

If Finland is to be saved, Sweden, a neutral, must help, and the Allies must help. If the Allies and European neutrals will not help or cannot help, then the help we would give will not save Finland. If they will help, our help will not now be necessary.

I think we should stop arming aggressors instead of trying to work out plans for indirectly arming victims of aggressors. We should break off diplomatic relations with Russia. We should be considering an embargo against Russia and against Japan. Instead of this we are asked to help Finland by voting for this bill that is 80 percent for someone else and 20 percent for something that Finland does not want.

I hate to see our policy always one of indirection, irresolution, double talk, and double dealing. When I see Uncle Sam first shake his fist and then his finger; first shake hands, then shake his head, it shakes my confidence.

We owe it to Finland not to pass this makeshift. Our people are now giving freely to Finland. If this bill passes, word will go out, "Finnish loan bill passes." Over the country generous people will feel that our Government has taken care of Finland's needs and will stop contributing to Finland. You and I know that passage of this bill will not guarantee Finland one cent. We will have relieved our people of a personal responsibility and ourselves of a public responsibility by passing the buck to one man—Jesse Jones. Let us not fool our people. Let us not fool Finland. Let us vote down this bill.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I am not a bit surprised that the gentleman from Ohio is opposed to this bill, because it is nothing new to observe him opposing beneficial legislation. However, when the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] took the floor I started to congratulate him. I felt that he finally had seen the light. I did not know whether or not it was due to the fact that he is a formidable candidate for the Presidency. In view of the Presidential candidates on the Republican side, I do not know why he should not have a better chance than the other candidates. He surely has much greater experience and knowledge of conditions than any of those heretofore mentioned. He has been publicized as much as they have. But I regret that he miscued when he began again to unjustifiably assail and unjustly attack our great President. First he commended the President, and I said to myself, "Well, the gentleman has seen the light. He will use better judgment in the future than he has in the past." But as the gentleman continued I regret he again began in his old manner to make regrettable and unsupportable charges. He surely has shown in every conceivable way his antagonism to our progressive President, Franklin D. Roosevelt.

I do not know whether or not it is due to the extreme amount of business he has on hand or assignments in connection with his Presidential candidacy, but I know that if he had even casually studied this question he would not have said that we have appropriated $100,000,000. In fact, there was only a loan authorization to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of $100,000,000. I think the gentleman should be more guarded in the future if he desires or expects to make headway in his candidacy. If his strenuous campaign promotes inexactitudes, we will pardon him. Obviously, a Presidential candidate, with so many matters, large and small, in mind must make some errors.

The same thing is true as to the amount that has been loaned to South American countries. He says there was only an excuse that we were going to try to increase our export business in Central and South America, but the underlying reason was to make loans to Russia. He failed, however, to state or admit that no loans have been made to Russia.

For his information, and so that he will not be called to exact account and found in error, I want to say that of all the loans that have been made by this bank 62½ percent have been made to Central and South American countries to the benefit of the commerce of the United States. Each and every loan to South American countries are well secured and none are in default. I do hope we shall continue to increase these loans to help our manufacturers regain the trade that has been taken away from us by Germany, Great Britain, France, and other countries.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. With regard to the violation of the Constitution that is being brought about by reason of Jesse Jones' handling this matter. Who set up the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and who gave that power to the Chairman? The Republican Party under Mr. Hoover set up that organization.

Mr. SABATH. In that bill they gave a certain amount of power, but they originally did not set up that organization. For your information, I am guilty, although I do not want any glory. I was the first man to introduce an R. F. C. bill in this House in 1931, and I made every effort to have it passed but, unfortunately, under the influence of President Hoover the bill was emasculated and the benefits intended for the people and the commerce of the Nation were extended only to the railroads, the banks, and the life-insurance companies, who the Republicans at all times wish to serve and favor in preference to the legitimate business of the country.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. The gentleman from New York did not object to "violating the Constitution" when the Republicans were using the funds to aid the railroads, insurance companies, and banks.

Mr. SABATH. With all that, he is not the worst Republican we have here, and I have no quarrel with the gentleman whatever. He far excels all other Presidential candidates that are before us on the Republican side, unless it be my friend, the minority leader, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Although the bill does not specifically mention any loan that may be made to Finland, is it not a fact that the committee brings to the House at this time the measure because it will provide funds for Finnish defense?

Mr. SABATH. It will authorize them, and I hope the authorization will be favorably acted upon, and that this little, brave, courageous, democratic country will be aided by this great Republic of ours to the fullest possible unmilitary extent.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KEEFE. Can the gentleman explain whether or not the Johnson Act has any application to loans made by the Export-Import Bank?

Mr. SABATH. It is only with respect to loans to the foreign governments; and the bill, as I understand, restricts the loans to foreign governments in accordance with the Johnson Act.

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BARRY. The committee adopted an amendment which makes the provisions of the Johnson Act apply to this particular matter. Under the Johnson Act, the Export-Import Bank is not affected, but in this particular bill it is by virtue of an amendment.

Mr. KEEFE. I am asking the question for information.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BARRY] is a member of the committee that held the hearings.

Mr. KEEFE. And the gentleman states that the committee adopted an amendment?

Mr. BARRY. Yes.

Mr. KEEFE. An amendment to what?

Mr. BARRY. An amendment making the provisions of the Johnson Act apply to this particular authorization.

Mr. KEEFE. So the Johnson Act does apply to this authorization?

Mr. BARRY. It did not apply in the Senate bill. I happen to have sponsored that amendment in the committee, and it applies to the particular bill now before the House.

Mr. KEEFE. And the gentleman intends to propose such an amendment?

Mr. BARRY. It is already in the bill.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SABATH. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. EATON. Will the gentleman be good enough to point out where in this bill a loan to Finland is authorized?

Mr. SABATH. Well, not directly, but it is authorized indirectly, if she qualifies.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SABATH. I am always glad to yield to the gentleman who is my genial friend, and whom I personally admire.

Mr. FISH. I would like to ask the gentleman if he will kindly propose now a motion or request that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to extend their own remarks on this measure.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members who desire to extend their own remarks on this bill may have 5 legislative days within which to do so.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 3069) to provide for increasing the lending authority of the Export-Import Bank of Washington, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 3069, with Mr. PARSONS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, this bill amends the Export-Import Bank law. By an Executive order this bank was established in 1934 under the laws of the District of Columbia, and it is a corporation which has a capital stock at the present time of $46,000,000, $1,000,000 of which is common stock owned by the Government, and the $45,000,000 preferred stock is owned by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. It was organized for the sole purpose of expediting the exchange of commodities between this country and foreign countries, and to facilitate and stimulate our export trade.

When the amount of business that this bank has done is compared with the total amount of the export business of the country, it is comparatively small, but it is an important part because this bank fills a gap in helping finance our export trade that is not being filled and cannot be filled by the commercial banks of the country.

The bill which is before us is S. 3069, and is the bill practically as it passed the Senate. It enlarges the lending capacity of the bank so that it may have outstanding $200,000,000 in loans rather than $100,000,000, as the law now provides. It does not in any way increase the authority or power of the bank. It does not permit the bank to make any kind of new loans. It simply permits it to make more of the same kind of loans which it has heretofore made. On the other hand, this bill, it must be remembered, places very important restrictions and limitations upon the activities of the bank. In the first place, under our present law there is no limitation as to the amount of loans which may be made to any particular individual borrower except the total limitation of $100,000,000.

This bill provides that of the loans hereafter made no more than $20,000,000 may be outstanding to any particular borrower at any time. That may be in addition, however, to any loan that is now made and outstanding. In other words, the borrower who has a loan, say, of $10,000,000 now, under this bill may receive $20,000,000 more. If there is no loan now, the borrower can obtain only $20,000,000. In addition to that, there are these specific limitations: No loan shall be made in violation of international law and no loan shall be made for the purpose of purchasing any articles listed by the President as materials of war in his proclamation under the neutrality law.

I ask you all, What objection can there be to those limitations? Who wants them? To start with, the bank itself wants these limitations. Is it possible that we are going to have somebody in Congress, when the bank comes here and asks these limitations be put on its powers, when Jesse Jones, the man who is the central figure in its operations, the Federal Loan Administrator, thinks these limitations are desirable—is it possible that somebody in Congress is going to object and seek to remove those limitations and give them a blank check to do what they please with the money? That would be, to my mind, an unreasonable, an unthinkable situation.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield briefly?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. In a moment I shall be glad to yield, when I have finished my statement. The important question, in fact, the only question that is involved here, is whether or not the lending capacity of the Export-Import Bank should be increased. This bill asks that that fund be doubled. Why? Simply because there is an almost unlimited demand for this efficient service that the Export-Import Bank has been rendering the export trade of this country. During the time it has been in operation it has disbursed over $120,000,000 and it has now on hand commitments and applications for over $50,000,000, which it cannot meet unless this enlarged power is given it. That is the reason, and if this policy is sound, and if it is a safe venture, why should not the loans be extended? It is supplying a service that these exporters cannot get anywhere else. It is to meet this demand that this request is being made by the bank, in order to have additional funds with which to meet the demands that are being placed on it.

As to the policy, it has already been established. These loans have already been made. There is nothing new in it. We have made the loans. As to its being a safe venture, the record of the bank speaks for that. Of the $120,000,000 that has been extended, not a single dollar has been lost. It has been a winning proposition, not a losing one, and we are here standing upon the record of the bank, asking that its activities may be increased, not alone to make a loan to Finland, not for the purpose of making a loan to any country or individual, but in order that there may be available to the people of this country the funds and finances by which our surplus agricultural and manufactured products can be exported to the nations of the world. That is what this bill is for. The bank has a record of fine performance, and it is worthy of the confidence of the Members of this Congress. During the time it has been in operation it has made a net profit of $5,000,000, and has not a single loan now in default. I am not saying that in the operations of the future there will not be some losses. In an enterprise as extensive as this is, necessarily from time to time losses are sustained, but as long as your profits are greater than your losses, it is a safe venture, and that is the history of this institution.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes more. There has been a great deal said about a loan to Finland. This bill has been referred to as the Finnish loan bill. There is a reason for that. There is a reason why that expression has crept into the press and into the public mind. The President of the United States, in his letter of January 16, to the Speaker of this House and to the President of the Senate, said that "there is, without doubt, in the United States a great desire for some action to assist Finland to finance the purchase of agricultural surpluses and manufactured products, not including implements of war," and he stated in that same letter that the enlargement of the lending powers of the Export-Import Bank might be the most reasonable approach to the subject in order that they may obtain a loan through the bank. This original bill, when it was presented to the Senate by Senator BROWN, who does us the honor of being present at this time, and who was a former able, outstanding Member of this body, provided for a direct loan to Finland of $60,000,000 by the R. F. C.

After further consideration and discussion, the distinguished Senator somewhat modified his view and drafted substantially the bill which is before us now, and in its consideration in the Senate he gave it his able and enthusiastic support. Those are the reasons why there is tied up with this bill a Finnish loan.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Not just now.

Finland is not mentioned in this bill; but if this legislation is passed, it will give that heroic, immortal little country at least an opportunity to obtain aid and assistance from this the greatest of all democratic nations. Everybody—the world, outside of Russia and perhaps Germany—has an abiding and profound sympathy for that little nation; that nation that is making the most determined and courageous stand in behalf of democratic ideals and for the preservation of human liberty that has ever been recorded; that little nation that is faced with insurmountable difficulties and overwhelming odds, enduring untold hardships and suffering; that little Republic that is now holding the front line of the world's democracies.

It is said that if this loan should be made to Finland it cannot or will not be repaid. I do not know as to that, but I do know that Finland has to her credit a long line of unbroken payments on her obligations to the world. While other nations, stronger and greater and richer than she, have faltered, hesitated, and defaulted and failed, Finland alone has remained true to her obligations and has remained faithful to her promises to us and to the world. [Applause.]

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Did not Mr. Jones testify that the chief purpose of this bill was to stimulate export trade?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. And did he not also say that when we made a loan, the loan had to be well secured?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Yes.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 additional minute.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. CELLER. When a loan was made by the Export-Import Bank to China of $25,000,000, there were no restrictions placed upon it at all, were there? The money could be used to purchase anything.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. There was no restriction placed upon any of the loans that have been made before. However, the loan was not made to China.

Mr. CELLER. The loan was not made to China?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. No.

Mr. CELLER. To whom was it made? Was it not made for the benefit of China?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. You may call it for the benefit of China. The loan was made for the purpose of exchanging commodities between the United States and nationals of China, or the Chinese Government, if you so please.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Senator ADAMS in the Senate is quoted as saying what I am just about to read to the gentleman, and I would like to have his views upon this subject. He said:

> That the Export-Import Bank agrees with the American exporter that if the foreign buyers do not pay for what they buy, the United State Government will stand anywhere from half to all of the loans.

What is there to that assertion?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. I do not think there is anything at all to that assertion. If he means by that that the Export-Import Bank takes a part of the obligation from the American exporter, that is true. That is the way they carry on their business. It is a participating loan. We will say an exporter makes a sale to a foreign business concern. He takes the obligation or note of the foreign national, endorsed by a bank. It is submitted to the Export-Import Bank for approval, and if the bank thinks it is sound, it will take half of that loan. If that is what he means by assuming half the obligation, that is correct, because that is the manner in which these obligations are handled.

Mr. O'CONNOR. What I am trying to get at is this: Suppose a foreign purchaser defaults, the question is, Does the Export-Import Bank sustain the loss or bear any part of the loss, or all of it?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Of course, if the Export-Import Bank takes the obligation of the foreign purchaser and it is not paid, the Export-Import Bank will necessarily lose.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Has the Export-Import Bank authority to make such an agreement?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Oh, yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has again expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 1 additional minute.

The law, of course, itself gives the Export-Import Bank the right to discount paper in order to make these loans.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I do not want the taxpayers of this country to have to make up a loss to the Export-Import Bank or to the American exporter for the default of a foreign country which buys products from an American exporter.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. None of us wants that, and none of us has experienced that so far. As I have already pointed out, in the operation so far there has been a net profit of $5,000,000 in the transactions.

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Just briefly.

Mr. SHANLEY. Suppose a government that is in debt to us sets up an artificial entity like our Export-Import Bank in their nation. Are you going far enough with this bill? Suppose the French or the British or any other debt-owing nation should set up later an entity that corresponds to the Export-Import Bank, will they be covered by your amendment?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. That is the intention of it. I think it should be covered by it, because we have agreed upon that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I will use a little more of my time to answer these questions, but I do not want to take all of the time.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. GEYER of California. Does this loan allow the purchase of airplanes?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. It allows the purchase of commercial airplanes.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. How does the Export-Import Bank get the funds which it lends?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. The funds of this bank come from the R. F. C. by means either of loans by the R. F. C. or the purchase by the R. F. C. of preferred stock of the bank. In other words, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation can make a loan to the bank for the necessary funds, or it can purchase preferred stock in the bank, which is, in fact, the same thing.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Where does the R. F. C. get its funds?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. The R. F. C. gets its funds by selling its debentures to the public.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. And not to the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. No.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. So, although there is a guaranty, as I understand, of the debentures of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, there is no direct draft on the Treasury by the R. F. C.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. The gentleman has stated it correctly. This bill can be passed and there will be no additional increase of the national debt; and I might say, in view of past history, that there will be no reasonable probability of loss to the Treasury.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. I have enjoyed very much the very splendid statement made by my distinguished colleague from Missouri. As I remember, there was opposition by certain Members and groups to the continuation of the life of the Export-Import Bank. Does this bill limit the operation of the bank to what it was when its life was extended?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Yes; so far as time is concerned, there is no further extension of time. It simply permits the bank to lend more than it has heretofore been able to lend, with the limitation placed on those loans in this bill.

Mr. ZIMMERMAN. And the objections urged against extending the life of the bank at that time and the limitation on the functions of the bank by this bill ought to encourage the support of that group rather than its opposition.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Yes; that is right.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Reference has been made to loans to the Chinese Bank. How are these loans being repaid by China?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. They are being repaid by China; and I may say to the gentleman from Colorado that they are ahead of their scheduled time in the payment. In other words, they have paid back more than the agreements called for up to the present time.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Are they being paid in silver or gold?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. They are being paid largely by the sale in this country of tung oil and tin, articles we do not produce in this country but which we need. In this connection let me say that this bank has not been used, and will not, under any circumstances, be used to import into this country articles that will come into competition with articles produced here.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. The gentleman from Missouri is making a very fine presentation of the situation, and, with his permission, I would like to call attention to a colloquy between Senator BROWN and Senator VANDENBERG when the bill was under consideration in the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Yes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. This is a very clear explanation of the nature of loans made by the Export-Import Bank. I read:

Mr. VANDENBERG. It occurs to me that the use of the unlimited phrase "loans to China" carries a much broader implication than the practice of the Export-Import Bank contemplates.

Mr. BROWN. The Senator is correct about that.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think it would be well to have that definitely in mind, for it presents a rather different picture when we remember that the previous loan to China so far is simply the use of American money to finance a barter trade of American commodities for tung oil, and that the new loan contemplated—the so-called new loan—is actually not a loan at all but is merely the financing of an exchange of tin for American commodities. That is rather a different picture from that presented by the broad phrase of a "loan to China."

Mr. BROWN. I have been referring more particularly to outside limitations. The Senator is entirely correct. I think he makes an exceedingly valuable contribution when he points out that these are not outright loans to particular governments; they are advances to citizens of the United States to aid them in the sale of their surplus agricultural or manufactured goods to a government or to the nationals of a government, and they are in no sense of the word loans to China or to Finland.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will my colleague further yield?

Mr. BROWN. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I may supplement what has been previously said with the further information from the record that in the tung-oil barter transaction the American purchases came from 570 different American firms. So that the use of the loose phrase "loans to China" in no sense describes the actual nature of the transaction which has occurred or is subsequently contemplated, and I think it makes considerable difference.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. In principle it is that of an exchange of commodities between us and different nations, and if it be simply construed as a barter or exchange of commodities between countries, that is exactly the thing the act provided for.

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. PATRICK. That brings us right down to the purpose of creating the Export-Import Bank, which has frequently been stated as the method this Nation has of promoting the exchange with other countries of our agricultural and manufactured products. That is the whole purpose of this legislation. Has it been serving this purpose very effectively all over the world?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. It has. The loans that have been made have carried American products into 55 different countries of the world. In other words 55 different countries have received the assistance rendered by this bank; and it is unthinkable to my mind for any group in this country which wants to extend our export trade to be opposed to the continuation of this function of the bank.

Mr. PATRICK. And it only started in 1934.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I am sure there is no doubt in the mind of the gentleman that by the placing of additional funds to the credit of the bank at this time through action of Congress, Finland will not avail itself of a loan through that agency.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. It is my hope that Finland may be able to get a loan under this bill if we pass it. As to whether she will or not I cannot, of course, answer because that is a matter that will be up to the bank. I hope so.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I would like to have the gentleman's opinion on this matter.

I believe, and I may be wrong—I want the gentleman to correct me if I am in error—that it is unmistakably true that this bill would not be here today were it not for the fact of the high and intense feeling toward the Finnish Republic and the people of that Republic. Does not the gentleman think that in order to protect the reputation of this House, its forthrightness, and our legislative program, we ought to say straight out and out that this bill is a bill for the purpose of aiding Finland?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. There are two answers to that question. In the first place, the gentleman's premise, in my judgment, is entirely wrong when he says this bill would not be here if it were not for the demand for a loan to Finland. This bill was here about this time last year, and this very bill passed the Senate and was reported by the Banking and Currency Committee to this House. It was not passed by the House, but it was presented for consideration, which shows conclusively that the request or desire on the part of the Export-Import Bank for additional funds did not originate with the Finland loan by any means. They have been making this request over a period of a year, and a bill was introduced, passed by the Senate, and reported favorably by the Banking and Currency Committee.

In the second place, the gentleman referred to a loan to Finland. If we want to make a so-called loan to Finland, if we want to make a grant to Finland, let us have the courage and the manhood to stand up on the floor of this House and by declaration authorize the Treasury of the United States to give Finland $20,000,000 or $30,000,000 or $60,000,000. Let us not do it through the Export-Import Bank. We are not doing that by this bill. We are putting Finland upon exactly the same basis as any other nation, the same basis as Norway and Sweden, and if they can meet the requirements that the bank lays down, they can get the loan. If they do not, then they will not get the loan. As I said a while ago I have hopes that they will be able to meet the requirements, and I have hopes that Norway and Sweden may be able to meet the requirements, because, if Finland is overrun, it looks to me as if they might be the next ones. But if we want to make a grant to one of these nations, let us not do it through the Export-Import Bank, which, under the law, is required to extend credit upon sound security. Let us not graft it on to this bill, but let us come here as men and proclaim to the world that we as a nation are going to give Finland thirty, fifty, or sixty million dollars. [Applause.]

Mr. MASSINGALE. I agree with what the gentleman from Missouri states and the attitude he takes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 30 minutes.

Mr. MASSINGALE. May I say in addition to what I have already said, in response to the gentleman's answer to my inquiry, that that is what I meant when I directed the question to the gentleman. We ought to be through with camouflaging and should come out here and vote on our own responsibility in regard to this loan.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. I thank the gentleman, and that is exactly what I am in favor of doing.

Mr. GORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GORE. The Banking and Currency Committee is not engaging in any camouflage.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Montana.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Unfortunately I did not hear all of the gentleman's speech. Will the gentleman tell us what the record of collections has been by this bank, whether there have been any defaults, and if so, to what extent?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. There has not been a single default. We have not lost a dollar, and we have a net profit of over $5,000,000.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Have any loans been made to Japan?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. No.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Or to Russia?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. No.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Did not Mr. Jones testify that all money that may be lent under this bill would be spent for goods purchased in this country?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Yes; and I am glad the gentleman refers to that. Whether the loan is made to a national or to the agency of a national or to a nation itself, if made to a nation, Finland, for instance, every dollar of that money must be spent in this country. The money is not turned over to the country or to the national or to the agency to be spent in the purchase of arms or anything else somewhere in the world outside the United States. Every dollar must be spent for the purchase of American goods to be exported to foreign countries.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. The bill reported by our committee last year carried the identical amount set forth, $100,000,000?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. And that was before anybody thought about Finland?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. That is true.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. RAYBURN. I have not been able to hear all of the remarks of the gentleman, but I take it from his answer made to the gentleman from Oklahoma that he feels as I do, that when people ask you when the Finnish loan bill is going to be taken up he does not brand this as a Finnish loan bill. It is no more a Finnish loan bill than a Norwegian, Denmark, or a Venezuelan loan bill, or a bill involving a loan to any other country in the world. Is that true?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. That is true.

Mr. RAYBURN. I was glad to hear the gentleman in his very able statement say that this bill would have been here if Russia had never invaded Finland, for the simple reason it was before the House last year. It passed the Senate in the so-called spend-lend bill last year and came to the House from the Banking and Currency Committee. A rule for its consideration was voted down. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 10 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me thoroughly established that at least 98 percent of our people wish to help Finland. It is acknowledged in all the newspapers that we are today voting on a Finnish loan bill. If you try to explain to your constituents, after this day is over, that you voted for a bill to help Finland, your ears should be very red. It is not a Finnish loan bill, in any sense of the word. The previous speaker said he hoped that that nation might get some benefit from it. You have made it almost impossible to give any genuine help because of the conditions imposed in the bill itself.

I want to direct my remarks to one phase in particular. Japan and China are not declared belligerents. They have not acknowledged a state of war, therefore we do not recognize the situation as such. Our security is not at stake, so the President does not have to declare them belligerents. Russia and Finland have not said that they are belligerents, therefore we do not say so.

The Export-Import Bank was set up in 1934 to help Russia and to evade the Johnson Act. Russian business did not materialize. The Second Export-Import Bank was set up to help Cuba. We used it for awhile in only one phase of business, then the two were merged.

You cannot get away from the fact that in the minds of the people we are voting today on a Finnish loan. Why does not the speaker who just left the floor have the courage to amend his bill and specifically vote $20,000,000 for Finland? That is exactly what I want to do. Vote it in this very bill. If the Export-Import Bank could loan China $25,000,000, why can we not through the same agency take care of Finland? It can be done as well as in any other bill. Why would this be different than a direct loan from the Government? We are acting a lie. Of course Japan is at war, but we are selling Japan anything she wants. She is killing millions of Chinese, and we are selling her the materials with which to do it. She is not a declared belligerent, so we can do business with her. But in the case of poor little Finland, which is not even in default in her obligations to us, we write a bill here today, even putting in it provisions treating her as though she were a belligerent. Read carefully the last page of the bill. Read those conditions! If you do not remove them, I shall indeed feel greatly disturbed. I might vote for the bill if that is done. But why stigmatize Finland as a belligerent by saying that you cannot sell her any ammunition through the Export-Import Bank? What is the difference between selling nations through the Export-Import Bank and selling through other channels, if they are not declared belligerents? Of course, all the money remains in this country. We furnish the money to people here so that they may sell to Finland. There may be a Finnish corporation set up for that purpose and the Finnish Government may guarantee the loan, but here you deliberately say, "Finland, you are to be treated as a belligerent." We do not act thus with Russia or Japan. Shame on such a proceeding.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I believe it was made very clear by the gentleman who presented the bill, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WILLIAMS], that no money from this bank has been loaned to Japan.

Mr. GIFFORD. No; but what is the difference? She buys all the ammunition which she desires.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I thought the gentleman implied, at least, that it had been loaned to Japan by this bank.

Mr. GIFFORD. No. However, the gentleman suggested that we have the courage today to make a direct Government loan to Finland. I wish that we would. I should join him in that. It is time we did this for Finland, and we can do it today perfectly well by amending this bill. What I am complaining about is that special difficulties are made for Finland. Finland does not want chocolate creams; she wants ammunition.

Mr. CELLER. Will the gentleman offer an amendment to that effect?

Mr. GIFFORD. Of course, the amendment will be offered, but it ought to come from the Democratic side. What is the result when Republicans offer an amendment?

Mr. CELLER. There are some things in public opinion that might be aroused.

Mr. GIFFORD. I want you to read these conditions. How ridiculous. The R. F. C. is not now lending to nations which are in default. Why put it in this bill? Why put in this bill that we cannot sell any arms and ammunition to Finland, thereby treating her as though she were a belligerent? I am positively ashamed of the conditions which are being imposed. We sell to Japan in a little different way, only just a little different way. The small hope I have is that if we can loan Finland money she will barter goods with Italy or other countries for ammunition. All over this Nation of ours they are today holding bazaars and taking up collections for the relief of Finland. The whole Nation is eager to raise money for that distressed nation. But this is for food, medicines, and things of that nature. More recently we have been trying to raise some private funds—an endeavor to which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. VORYS] says he subscribes—to provide actual arms to Finland, but that contribution is made by ourselves as individuals. Why are we as a government so fearful? Of whom are we afraid? Perhaps somebody will tell us during the day.

We cannot make a loan to Finland under this bill, if you leave it as it is, except under international law as interpreted by the State Department. What is the present recognized international law? It plainly reads that we can only furnish food and raw materials. We cannot even furnish medicines, under the wording of the law. The State Department's representative came before our committee and said they might interpret that law to take in a great many other things which really were not food and medicines. Contraband now covers a great amount of merchandise, but such conditions make it more difficult for Finland to get any money. These conditions are unnecessary; they are simply impediments.

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BARRY. Why are we under any obligation to lend money to Finland?

Mr. GIFFORD. Because 98 percent of our people want us to, according to your President. And in the name of pure humanity.

Mr. BARRY. That is a conclusion.

Mr. GIFFORD. Do we represent that 98 percent? Are we, as a rich and powerful nation, today really in sympathy with this little country, or are we hypocrites and merely talking a lot, while doing nothing practical to assist Finland?

Mr. BARRY. The only reason that Finland is in any different position from any other country is because Finland simply paid its obligations, while the other countries welshed on theirs.

Mr. GIFFORD. Well, do not compare her with Russia.

Mr. BARRY. Does not the gentleman consider that if he lends me money and I pay it back to him that I still should be grateful to the gentleman?

Mr. GIFFORD. Do not make me draw comparisons between Finland and her actions and those of other countries. We love Finland, but we do not love Russia.

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. SHANLEY. I notice the gentleman quoted a statement of Mr. Hackworth, legal adviser of the State Department, in which he said the Government might have the right to send certain commodities to Finland, and I wonder if the gentleman agrees with that statement as a real interpretation of international law.

Mr. GIFFORD. He said the State Department might interpret it liberally, but that is hardly convincing. We want to provide Finland with something that will be of real help; something that she needs to defend herself.

Mr. SHANLEY. But the gentleman will agree that international law means you cannot do that, although he attempted to worm out of this interpretation by using the Habana Convention.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman knows that the law reads "food and raw materials."

Mr. SHANLEY. No; I do not, because I know that international law says that the government per se cannot sell, cannot lend it, or cannot do anything like that.

Mr. GIFFORD. Well, I am quoting the Havana Convention.

Mr. SHANLEY. The gentleman does not agree that that changes international law?

Mr. GIFFORD. I know that you must first submit these matters to the whim of the State Department. Why do you do that? Why not let Mr. Jones, in whom you have every confidence, act in his own way and let him decide the matter? He stated, with respect to Finland, that he thought this was a good risk. He thought there would always be a Finnish spirit and a Finnish people, and he believed that $10,000,000 was a good loan. I believe he had already advanced $8,000,000.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 additional minutes.

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. GIFFORD. Perhaps I should not, because the gentleman gets me into the field of international law, which he knows all about and I know little about.

Mr. SHANLEY. The gentleman knows I do not do it purposely.

Mr. GIFFORD. The gentleman knows that I know little about it, while he is a student of the subject.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. KEEFE. Is it not a fact that if this loan to Finland were as paramount as the gentleman says it is, with 98 percent of the people of the country demanding it, the Export-Import Bank could make a loan to Finland now without this additional capital?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes; Finland is not in default, and the bank has about $36,000,000 available. They have used $64,000,000, and they had $100,000,000. They say they have allocated or committed $50,000,000, but that means little. A person or corporation comes in to them and says, "We would like to do business with Brazil," or some other country. "If we can get the order, will you back us up?" They do not always, or perhaps even often, get the order. The bank has $34,000,000, and if it has committed $50,000,000 it can likewise commit $5,000,000 or $10,000,000 more to Finland.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Jones testified they could cancel those commitments at any time.

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, yes, and with respect to this $100,000,000, they are using Finland in order to get it. We are well informed as to what they are trying to do.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Jones made this statement on page 3 of the hearings:

> I can give you the figures fairly accurately, I think. The total loans authorized have been $290,770,000. Of this authorization, $109,554,000 were canceled due to the fact that in most cases the manufacturer was not successful in securing the order for which he made a bid, and a few cases were canceled because the situation changed.

Mr. GIFFORD. Exactly. I want now to continue, and shall not yield until I have finished making an additional statement. As much as I think of Mr. Jesse Jones—and nobody appreciates him more than I—I am tired of hearing here and also on the floor in another body about $10,000,000,000 having been loaned without any loss by the R. F. C. I have the record here. You must have it in your own offices. They have been committed to about nine billion and a half of loans, but they never have actually loaned much over $5,000,000,000, because large amounts were allocated for relief purposes. Some two billion seven hundred million were actually marked off the books of the Corporation as relief expenditures. As I understand it, actual loans of not over one-half of the $10,000,000,000 that you gentlemen boast about have ever been made.

We know perfectly well the record of certain South American countries as to defaults. So long as the bank has more money to loan, these countries will keep current in their payments, but the minute that fund is gone, watch out for defaults. Those are portentous words spoken in another body by one of its most prominent Members. As these are usually long-term loans, of course, there are few, if any, defaults yet recorded.

However, at the moment I am pleading that we eliminate these restrictions from the bill. Give Finland what she really needs. Let Mr. Jones make an unhampered decision. There is no reason why he cannot make Finland a loan for any purpose, on the one condition that, as he says, there is a reasonable hope of her repayment. He must have great confidence in this probability.

Can Finland without assistance hold out much longer? Sweden and Norway may well be frightened over their neutrality, although they have assisted greatly. But we, a great country, safely 3,000 miles away, are afraid of something or somebody.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield myself one-half minute more.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Assuming that this bill would help Finland, does not the gentleman feel it is weeks late in being brought to the floor of the House? Gallant little Finland has endured untold misery. Aid from us in the early days might have helped greatly. Why did not the administration make assistance to Finland one of the early measures of this Congress? America has deep admiration of Finland's honesty in paying its debt to us. The people of America have wanted to show that admiration, that appreciation, in some tangible way. The able Minister of Finland, Mr. Procope, has worked tirelessly to explain what his brave country men and women are enduring. He should have the deep gratitude of his nation. We have great appreciation of her courage.

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, yes; this is called a Finnish bill, but of no aid to Finland.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. On pages 3 and 4 of the quarterly report of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation the gentleman will find this statement made by Mr. Jones:

> Summarizing the foregoing, there is allocated $9,704,000,000, plus.

Mr. GIFFORD. I have that here.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Then further he states that of that amount $2,042,000,000 were withdrawn or cancelled.

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes; but they talk about loans of $10,000,000,000. The R. F. C. has done well but it should not try to double the amount actually loaned.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has again expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes now to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SPENCE].

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, this bill is just what it claims to be and nothing else—a bill to provide for increasing the lending authority of the Export-Import Bank. What is the Export-Import Bank? It is a corporation organized under the laws of the United States to do certain definite things. It is controlled by a chairman and a board of directors. In the making of loans they exercise an independent discretion and judgment, and you cannot take away from them that judgment as long as it retains its character as a corporation organized under the laws of the United States. The Board of Directors will pass upon the loans. They will weigh the securities, they will say whether or not the individual or the corporation or the government that makes application is entitled to the loan. A direction to the Export-Import Bank to make a loan to any individual or any government would be pure camouflage, and would not subserve the purpose for which it was alleged it was put in the bill at all, because any direction to the Export-Import Bank would necessarily be subject to the direction and control of the Board of Directors of that bank, and I say however much we may sympathize with that splendid little country that is fighting for its liberty, no matter how much we may admire the honor of its citizens and the integrity of that Government that stands out among the governments of the world conspicuous for these fine characteristics, we cannot by putting that direction into this bill assure the Republic of Finland the loan it desires. The direction to the Export-Import Bank to make a specific loan to a definite borrower would be comparable to placing in the charter of a national bank that loans must be granted to certain individuals. If the gentlemen are sincere, if the gentlemen really mean what they say, the only way that can be assured is by a grant to the Republic of Finland. If that country asks for a loan that Board of Directors is going to say to them, what is your security, what are the opportunities for repayment, what is your present status, as to the safety of your institutions, and can you fulfill your obligations? I think as far as that is concerned we can eliminate that from the bill. I believe the sentiment of this House is that Finland should be helped in some manner, but let us do it directly. If we want to do it, let us see that the Government gets what she asks for when she comes to the United States asking for help. Of course, she is precluded from coming here under our neutrality law and obtaining any of the implements of war, because she cannot come in her own ships and pay cash for the goods and take them away. If she can get a loan through the Export-Import Bank it will be entirely in the discretion of the governing Board of the Export-Import Bank to see to it that the money is used for certain purposes, to buy products of the United States.

But I say that in the consideration of this bill you might just as well leave that out of it and no direction that we can place in this bill will assure to Finland that she will get the help she needs.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield.

Mr. EATON. It seems that instead of this being a bill to make a loan to Finland, the only condition that it carries is a limitation on the possibility of making a loan to Finland—that they have to buy in this country.

Mr. SPENCE. Well, I do not know that that would be any great limitation. Finland could not ask as a loan for more than $20,000,000, because a loan presupposes payment. A loan presupposes security. In the present state of Finland I doubt that she could come here and assure this Government or assure the lending agencies of this Government that she could repay more than $20,000,000. If you want to help Finland the only assured way is by a grant, because loans imply conditions, and the conditions may be such that the borrower cannot fulfill.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield.

Mr. MOTT. I understood the gentleman to say that Finland could not avail herself to buy arms in this country, even if she had the money, because she has no ships in which to transport them. She can use nonbelligerent ships and the ships of neutrals and still buy them, can she not?

Mr. SPENCE. Yes; I think she could use the ships of nonbelligerents.

Mr. MOTT. Then she could avail herself if she had the money?

Mr. SPENCE. If she had the money; yes.

Mr. MOTT. May I inquire if the gentleman is in favor of a direct loan to Finland?

Mr. SPENCE. A direct loan to Finland?

Mr. MOTT. Yes.

Mr. SPENCE. I would be very happy to see Finland obtain a direct loan, but I do not believe in deception. I do not believe in putting things in bills that will be entirely ineffective to accomplish the purpose they are supposed to accomplish.

Mr. MOTT. I agree with the gentleman. I understand we are going to have an opportunity to vote on a substitute for this bill, or an amendment which will carry that provision.

Mr. SPENCE. An amendment to the bill directing the Export-Import Bank to make a definite loan—I think that would be comparable to granting a charter to a national bank and in the charter to the bank saying to whom they can make loans. I think that destroys the whole purpose of this artificial person—this corporation—that must be administered by a board that exercises its discretion as to whom loans will be made.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. What are the gentleman's views as to whether or not Finland may be able to qualify for a loan with the Export-Import Bank?

Mr. SPENCE. Well, I have no knowledge of that. The committee never looked into that question at all. The committee never investigated as to whether or not Finland could qualify for a loan. I devoutly hope that Finland may not only qualify for a loan but that Finland may crush Russia, but I am afraid my hope is in vain.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I fully agree with the gentleman when he says that he hopes Russia will be crushed. I think everybody is hoping and praying that Russia will be crushed. That is her due because of her indefensible attack upon this little brave nation who is only fighting to maintain her liberty. I think, however, that the committee should have given consideration as to whether or not Finland could qualify for a loan from this country. Is it not a part of our business to try to find out if legislation which we pass will accomplish the purpose of the same?

Mr. SPENCE. Of course, it was not given any consideration. It was not for the Banking and Currency Committee to investigate as to what loans the Export-Import Bank should make. That is perfectly ridiculous. Of course, we never had any investigation along that line, because it was not in our sphere. It is in the sphere of the Export-Import Bank as to whom they shall loan money and how it shall be secured.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Then, this bill should not be characterized as a bill to help Finland? The people are being misled.

Mr. SPENCE. I think not. The bill is exactly what it says it is. It is an extension of the powers of the Export-Import Bank.

Mr. O'CONNOR. It is the same bill that this Congress rejected a year ago?

Mr. SPENCE. No. They put it in the lend-spend bill, and they voted down the rule for the lend-spend bill. If this bill had been submitted independently it would have passed, and passed upon the record that the Export-Import Bank has made. Let me show you what the Export-Import Bank has done.

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KUNKEL. I take it, under this bill Finland is not required to get any of this money, and probably Finland never will on account of their financial standing, because any money they have they want to spend for ammunition.

Mr. SPENCE. I cannot answer that.

Mr. KUNKEL. That is your opinion, is it not?

Mr. SPENCE. When Finland makes her application for a loan, the loan will be passed upon by the board of directors of the Export-Import Bank. You have not said that you want Finland to have a grant. A loan presupposes repayment. A loan presupposes security. They look into those questions. Whether or not Finland can comply is a matter that I have no knowledge of.

Mr. KUNKEL. If you were a director you would be inclined not to grant Finland a loan?

Mr. SPENCE. No; I would not be inclined not to grant the loan.

Mr. KUNKEL. I mean under their present financial circumstances.

Mr. SPENCE. I would be inclined to investigate the facts and treat the application for a loan sympathetically.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 additional minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SPENCE. I want to read at this time a general statement of what the Export-Import Bank of Washington has accomplished with the funds at its disposal, and when we go back into the House I shall ask permission to extend in the RECORD following this general statement tables showing a break-down of the totals. This is very interesting and valuable information.

The general statement makes the following disclosures:

GENERAL STATEMENT

Total commitments: Since its establishment the Export-Import Bank has made commitments of $290,714,596.55.

Total cancelations: Because the interested American manufacturers were unable to obtain the business or failed to meet the bank's conditions, commitments aggregating $109,554,826.99 were canceled.

Total disbursements and repayments: Actual disbursements have amounted to $118,833,134.42, of which $51,484,670.93 has been repaid.

Total outstanding and undisbursed commitments: Total loans outstanding are $67,348,463.49, and undisbursed commitments are $63,333,207.85.

Earnings: Although the bank did not operate during the first 18 months of its existence, it has paid dividends upon its preferred stock at the rate of 3 percent per annum through December 31, 1938, and has funds with which to pay dividends accrued to date.

Net profit for the calendar year 1939 was $2,344,776.68.

The International Telephone & Telegraph exports annually equipment from the United States valued in excess of $3,000,000. The above represents the Export-Import Bank's participation in a $15,000,000 credit, the other $5,000,000 being provided by 5 American commercial banks.

SPECIAL TRANSACTIONS

Germany: The Export-Import Bank, acting on behalf of Farm Credit Administration, negotiated the settlement of a loan of $2,661,309.75 to Deutsche Getreide Handelsgesellschaft, m. b. h., upon which payments of principal were in default. Since Jan. 15, 1938, the sum of $1,500,000 has been collected, and the obligation is being reduced at the rate of $75,000 per month.

The passage of this bill does not involve any increase in the indebtedness of the United States. The Export-Import Bank has actually earned money on its operations since its inauguration. It will continue under the able management of Jesse Jones, who, I think, is perhaps the ablest administrator in the United States; a man who always has his feet on the ground; a man whose judgment is sound; a man who has made a success of his private business and a success of the great interests of the United States that have been entrusted to his care. I believe we can rely upon him to do the right thing by the people who come to this great institution asking for loans, and I believe we can rely upon him also to protect the interests of the United States. Leaving out of the question anything in regard to the Finnish loan, it is my belief that this bank, tried upon its own record and its accomplishments, will justly deserve to secure the additional $100,000,000 and an authorization to continue its functions. [Applause.]

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be a difference of opinion as to whether this bill is even supposed to be one providing aid for Finland. Certainly the press of the country, and I believe the people of the country, feel that the House is today considering a bill to make possible a loan to Finland; and I believe they think this is true because of statements uttered by the President of the United States. The President certainly indicated very plainly that the Export-Import Bank was the proper medium through which to give assistance to Finland. He so stated on at least two occasions.

There are definitely two questions involved in the consideration of this bill. The first is whether or not we should, regardless of Finland, increase the capital of the Export-Import Bank by $100,000,000, and I thought at least until this morning that we were considering possible aid to Finland. We do not need to give much consideration to the question of increasing the capital of the Export-Import Bank. If in the wisdom of Congress they feel that such provision will aid the export business of the country and is needed, such a bill will pass. I do believe, however, that we should give much more consideration to whether or not Finland is going to get a dime because of the increase by $100,000,000 of the capital of the Export-Import Bank. Certainly Mr. Jones told us in the Committee on Banking and Currency that there was no assurance the way this bill is drawn, that if the bill is passed Finland would get a dime. He said: "Finland may get $5,000,000, she may get $7,000,000, she may get $12,000,000, and she may not get anything."

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. Very briefly.

Mr. O'CONNOR. What is to prevent this same bank from making a loan to Finland of $20,000,000 if we do not pass this bill at all?

Mr. MILLER. Nothing. If the bank wanted to make it they would have made it a long time ago.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. MILLER. Very briefly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. It is also true that under the law as it now stands, and under this bill as it came from the Senate, the Export-Import Bank could lend to our nationals many times $20,000,000 to ship the same kind of goods to these countries.

Mr. MILLER. If they wanted to; certainly. I believe that the Members of this House and the people of the United States want to do something for Finland. I believe we should be given the opportunity of doing it here today; and at the proper time an amendment will be proposed that will make possible a definite vote.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SPENCE] made a great deal of the fact that we would in fact be instructing the board of directors of the Export-Import Bank as to how to run their business. I do not believe that is quite a proper interpretation of the action of this House, assuming that the House does take action to indicate to Mr. Jones that it is our desire that if Finland can meet the conditions we want the bank to make a loan to her. At the proper time I shall propose an amendment authorizing the Export-Import Bank to make such a loan. I believe, however, that we should not make it mandatory, but under existing circumstances they are authorized. It is possible there may be a declaration of war between Russia and Finland in the next week, which would change our position, but with the word "authorized" or "empowered" used therein, we would indicate our desire to authorize a loan to Finland on proper application of not to exceed $20,000,000 without restriction on the type of merchandise to be purchased in the United States. After all, if Finland wants help, she needs the things necessary to defend her territory and her liberty and we are not going to serve our conscience much if we simply increase the capital of the Export-Import Bank and allow Finland to buy things in this country that are surpluses, then go back home and righteously throw out our chest and say, "I voted for $100,000,000 and I thought a great deal of that would aid Finland," when, as a result of statements made on the floor this morning, if the bill passes in its present form Finland will get certain surpluses, and that is all she will get.

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. If we do not lend Finland money for defense purposes, for implements of war, for instance, our chances of ever getting any money back which we lend her for civil purposes will be very small.

Mr. MILLER. You will lessen that chance.

That brings us up to the question whether or not we have a right under international law and under our own Neutrality Act to make this loan. I call attention to the fact that the bill as drawn provides that the loans must be made in accordance with international law as determined by the State Department, and the amendment I propose to offer will not strike out that provision. Certainly I would not want to advocate and would not want to be a party to any violation of international law. If we are going to accept the ruling of the State Department and assume the attitude that there is no war going on in Finland or that Finland and Russia are not at war, and that China and Japan are not at war, then we can ship anything we want to those countries, because if we determine that they are at war, then certainly we cannot lend them money. If munitions are contraband, then by the same token money is contraband. There is not a Member of this House who would propose today that we lend money to any of the countries that are openly and legally at war, so we must start on the premise that legally there is no war between Finland and Russia. We have adequate precedents for this. You can split hairs and say that the Export-Import Bank did not lend $25,000,000 to China. No; that loan was made to a Chinese corporation in New York, and by the same token and by the same subterfuge the United States Government is not going to lend money to Finland.

We are going to do that through a corporation, the Export-Import Bank. I am sure if we notify Finland that the Export-Import Bank has $20,000,000, it will lend to a Finnish corporation incorporated in New York under the laws of Delaware, that that corporation will be set up before this bill can be passed.

Mr. JOHNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLER. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. JOHNS. Is it not a fact that they have such corporation set up now and we have already lent it $20,000,000?

Mr. MILLER. We have lent it $10,000,000, of which $8,000,000 have been spent, but I think that was a direct loan. Finland can qualify under the same requirement that we invoked for China.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SPENCE] emphasized the fact that this bank had to be bound by reasonable banking practices, that a loan implied security; still if you read the hearings Mr. Jones told the Banking and Currency Committee, and I know the gentleman from Kentucky will accept Mr. Jones' word for it, that he was confident it would be safe and prudent to lend Finland $20,000,000, and he felt Finland would repay that loan no matter what happened in the present emergency. I think his words were that there will be a Finnish people and a Finnish spirit for many years to come. He felt we were perfectly safe in lending this money to Finland under existing circumstances.

I think this covers, as best I can in the few minutes available, the thoughts I have on the Finnish loan. I would like to go back to the question of increasing the capital of the Export-Import Bank by $80,000,000 more than is needed to take care of this Finnish loan, and I want to revert to a loan made to a Chinese corporation, guaranteed by the Bank of China, which is in turn controlled by the Government of China.

This money was lent for the purpose of shipping automobile trucks, largely manufactured by the General Motors Corporation, to China. I submit that the Treasury of the United States is not in any condition to go out and borrow from its taxpayers money to lend and make possible the shipment of trucks, locomotives, and so forth, to any foreign government. I asked Mr. Jones if he could tell me why it was that General Motors, with its excellent financial condition, with the tremendous cash reserves its last statement shows, adequate, ample cash reserves, should not finance these shipments, and why the taxpayers of the United States should finance the shipment of these trucks, and so forth, for General Motors to China.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Jones said, in substance, that perhaps they were able to do it, but they would not do it. You can make the statement all you want that this money is not going to increase the national debt, but there is only one place that the Treasury of the United States, the R. F. C., or the Export-Import Bank can get money to spend or to lend to anybody, and that source is the taxpayers of the United States. Whether you route it through the Export-Import Bank or the R. F. C., if the money is lent to anybody it has to come from the pockets of the taxpayers. I do not believe we are in any condition to increase the capital of that bank for the purposes indicated in the hearings. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. THOMAS F. FORD].

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Chairman, a great deal has been said about this simple little bill which merely has as its purpose increasing the authority of the Export-Import Bank in the sum of $100,000,000. A great deal has been said about the bill for the purpose of making a loan to Finland.

As a matter of fact, under that bill loans will probably be made to China, to Sweden, and to Norway, still no one has had the temerity to get up and call it a Norwegian-loan bill or a Swedish-loan bill, or a Chinese loan bill, and as a matter of fact, it is none of these. It is not a bill to loan money to any particular country or any particular group of individuals; it is merely an authorization to increase the bank's lending power $100,000,000. If in the course of disbursing these funds an additional $20,000,000 is loaned to Finland, there is authority for that in this bill, but there is also a restriction that no person, corporation, nation, or otherwise, can secure a loan in excess of $20,000,000.

A great deal has been said about lifting the lid and letting us loan this money to Finland for any purpose. Let me make this observation. If Finland has $5,000,000 or $10,000,000 that she can transfer into dollars at the present time she can come to the United States and buy anything she has the money to pay for, and take it away, under the cash-and-carry provisions of the Neutrality Act. She can buy foodstuffs, munitions, or anything else. As a matter of fact, she is doing that right now with her own money, and there is no bar in international law that keeps us from selling to her providing she comes over and takes the goods away, under the provisions of the Neutrality Act. However, to make a loan to Finland to purchase war materials is a horse of another color. Clearly, if we did that, regardless of the fact that she is not at war technically, we would be, if not actually, violating international law or coming so close to it that we would be endangering the peace and safety of the United States, because that would put us in a position that might involve us in a war with another power.

If my friends on the other side, who claim they are the great peace party and who are going to save the United States from getting into war, are going to insist that we make that kind of a loan, a loan for the purchase of war materials, they will have lost their peace status entirely, and as warmongers must reckon with the people of the United States. Permit me to tell you that, gentlemen, to warn you before you make that mistake, for I am convinced that while 98 percent of the people want to help Finland, an equal number want to keep out of foreign wars.

It has been said and it should be said again that the primary purpose of this bill is to place funds at the disposal of the Export-Import Bank for the purpose of stimulating the foreign trade of the United States, and particularly the exports of the United States. I believe one of my colleagues on the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GORE], has a specific case to present to you. May I ask the gentleman from Tennessee if he does not have such a specific case?

Mr. GORE. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. That will explain exactly the mechanics of these loans.

On many occasions American exporters come to the Export-Import Bank and ask for a commitment of $1,000,000, $5,000,000, or whatever sum they happen to need. The reason they ask for that money is that they have bid on some large project in a foreign country, and they want to be sure of having the capital to carry it out if they get the order. They cannot go to an ordinary commercial bank and get that kind of a loan because the loan must run over a period of years, beyond the time a local commercial bank can loan. The bank investigates the matter, or the board does, and if they find that it is a sound loan, that if the people having the work done in the foreign country can get a good bank to endorse their paper and the firm that wants to do the work is a sound concern and can give its own endorsement and can participate to some extent in the loan the loan is made, and as a result $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 worth of American exports are sent to a foreign country and ultimately paid for.

Of the $290,000,000 that has been committed, only about $118,000,000 has been loaned and paid out. In my judgment, that ought to be a fairly good criterion by which to judge the care and the caution with which this bank handles the money entrusted to its care for the purposes we have heretofore stated.

Mr. Chairman, this is not a Finnish loan. This is no more a Finnish loan than it is a Chinese loan or a Norwegian loan or a Swedish loan or a railroad material supply loan. Any one of those captions might be applied to it under the philosophy that the opposition has attempted to develop here today.

If the Export-Import Bank receives this additional $100,000,000, it will be in a position to take up the $60,000,000 of advance commitments that it has made, and will have about $40,000,000 additional to make new loans. If I had my way, and if Mr. Jones would say he would take it, I would have liked to increase this amount to $300,000,000, because I can conceive of a situation arising in South America which will force good business that has been going to European concerns who can no longer supply their needs to turn to merchants and industries in this country. I can see under such conditions an opportunity for this bank to do a great deal more business than it is doing now, and for our American exporters to do a great deal more business than they are doing right now. For that reason I would like to see the bank have this authority increased, not $100,000,000 but $200,000,000, to enable it to carry on that business.

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. I am sorry, I cannot yield.

Mr. PATRICK. The gentleman is shedding so much light I thought maybe he would shed a little more.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. The gentleman will have an opportunity later.

Mr. PATRICK. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Now, they say there is going to be an amendment offered to this bill directing the Export-Import Bank to lend a certain amount to Finland. Another Member will offer an amendment that does not direct but merely authorizes the bank to make the loan. This is exactly the position of the old lady who said to her daughter who wanted to go out to swim, "Yes, my darling daughter; hang your clothes on a hickory limb but don't go near the water."

Under this bill, which I favor and shall vote for, if Finland can qualify for an additional loan of $20,000,000, she will get it. If the amendment to authorize a loan carries, Finland will still have to qualify to get the loan. Even if the so-called Fish amendment is adopted, Finland will still have to qualify, unless the Fish amendment provides for a gift of that sum to Finland.

Either of the amendments will delay the loan to Finland.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN].

Mr. KEAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to no one in my sympathy or admiration for the Finnish people, but in this bill my sympathy or the sympathy of the people of the country is being used as an excuse to get more money for the Export-Import Bank.

That this is true is evident from the testimony of the Federal Loan Administrator, Mr. Jesse Jones, as presented in the hearings.

On page 35 Mr. GIFFORD asked the following question:

> Somebody is trying to take advantage of it by using Finland's situation to get $100,000,000?
> Mr. JONES. There is no reason for Finland to be mentioned in this bill at all. This is the same bill which came up here last year.

Again, on page 36, in answer to a question by Miss SUMNER of Illinois, Mr. Jones said:

> I think if you do not want to pass this bill for general purposes it should not be passed.

Again, on page 45, Mr. JOHNSON asked:

> Do you consider this a bill to assist Finland?
> Mr. JONES. Not necessarily; no.

Again, on page 71, I said to Mr. Jones:

> There is no guaranty in this bill that any money goes to Finland, is there?

Mr. Jones answered:

> That is correct.

So let us forget the Finnish situation for a moment and consider this bill on its merits alone. I want to address myself particularly to my Republican colleagues.

Do you realize that if you vote for this bill you are adding $100,000,000 to the actual debt of the United States on the excuse that possibly, and at the most, $20,000,000 of it will go to Finland?

On page 71 of the hearings I said to Mr. Jones:

> This loan therefore is going to increase the public debt.

Mr. Jones replied:

> Indirectly; yes.

For where is this $100,000,000 coming from? It cannot be manufactured from thin air. As Mr. Jones testified, this money will come from a loan to the Export-Import Bank by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Now, where does the Reconstruction Finance Corporation get the money? Mr. Jones testified that this would come from the people of the United States through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation's selling bonds guaranteed, principal and interest, by the Federal Government.

Those of you who are going to support this bill are supporting the dodging of the Federal debt limit by allowing the sale of more Government-guaranteed bonds. As far as I am concerned, I do not believe in fooling the American people any further in this manner and will vote for no more guaranteed bonds under any circumstances.

Are we Republicans going to give the New Deal these additional funds with a possible pittance for Finland as a bait?

There is another important policy to be considered in this bill. The first Export-Import Bank was organized to finance business with Russia; the second to finance business with Cuba; and after these banks were merged into one the bank was used to help finance loans to American importers and shippers, largely to South America.

Many of these commitments were made for financing railroad equipment, and on much of the business no actual money was advanced at all, but the bank would guarantee a portion of the loan made by an exporter or a private banker in exchange for receiving a portion of the interest; thus, though the potential contingent liabilities of the bank were large at times, but a small amount of their capital funds were actually being used.

But today the bank seems to be entering on a new policy—that of lending our people's money to foreign governments themselves—for Mr. Jones testified that besides a small loan which may possibly be made to Finland, they were also committed to a loan to Norway, to Sweden; that Denmark had made application and that they were considering another $25,000,000 loan to China besides the $20,000,000 already loaned. If we are to enter into this policy, we should do it with our eyes open.

In the twenties our people financed, through the purchase of foreign bonds, exports from our country to foreign countries. Today a large portion of these bonds are in default—most of the central European bonds and 77 percent of the South American bonds—so that these South American and European nations not only got our money but our goods, too; and we have been criticizing the investment bankers for having advanced this money ever since.

Now we are entering upon the policy of having our Government, through the Export-Import Bank, do the same thing. Will there not be the same result? Only this time the Government itself being the creditor, will this not bring us even deeper into foreign troubles and squabbles?

There will be the same talk of Uncle Shylock. Nobody loves the man who lends him money after the money he lends has been all spent and he is asking for repayment. It seems to me that these New Deal creations go on and on and are always looking for more ways to spend the taxpayers' money, for if one source of spending dries up they seem always able to find another excuse to spend somewhere else.

If these loans to foreign governments are good, why is it necessary for a Government subsidiary to make them? We all know that there is a plethora of money in the banks; that excess reserves are the greatest in history; that every banker is anxious to find a safe place to use his bank's money if he can make the slightest return.

Today the banks are putting their money into 4- and 5-year Government bonds which yield less than 1 percent; and yet Mr. Jones testifies that they will not make these loans to foreign governments for the same term of years at 5 percent.

Is this merely a reflection of the current loss of confidence caused by New Deal policies and the tendency to "pass the buck" to the Federal Government to take over all the business of this country, or is it just that these loans are not safe? If this is the case, why should the Government take risks that the banks will not? Is the money of bank stockholders and depositors any more sacred than the taxpayers' money? We are trustees of the people's money and it is up to us to protect their interest.

This bill should be defeated. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KEAN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I understood the distinguished chairman of our committee a while ago to say that every loan to be made under this bill, if it is enacted in its present form, cannot exceed $20,000,000. Mind you, I say "every loan." Does the gentleman understand that to be the fact in this case?

Mr. KEAN. I understand that no loans can exceed $20,000,000, or any new loans.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is the point I am raising.

Mr. KEAN. That is, of the loans that have already been made; for instance, China has already been loaned, I believe, $25,000,000, and they can lend them $20,000,000 under this bill, which would make a total of $45,000,000.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The language of the bill is:

Provided further, That the aggregate amount of loans to any one foreign country and the agencies and nationals thereof, which are hereafter authorized to be made and are outstanding at any one time, shall not exceed $20,000,000.

Wherein does that limit the loans that can be made to our nationals by the Export-Import Bank out of these funds or any other funds to $20,000,000?

Mr. KEAN. It does not limit it at all.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is the point I want to clear up.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEAN. I yield.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The gentleman has stated, I believe, that the South American countries are in default on their bonded indebtedness to the extent of about 75 percent.

Mr. KEAN. Seventy-seven percent.

Mr. O'CONNOR. I have reliable information to the effect that the South American nations, with perhaps one exception, are already in default to the citizens of this country—not the Government, you understand—to the extent of $3,000,000,000.

Mr. KEAN. The actual amount outstanding today is $1,200,000,000. The total South American bonds outstanding, as I understand it, is $1,600,000,000, and the South American countries are in default $1,200,000,000. I believe the gentleman from Montana probably is thinking of the entire amount that was sold in this country. The South American governments have repatriated their bonds and instead of using the money to pay interest on the bonds, which they should have done under the terms of the bond, they have been taking this money and buying in their own bonds at 10 or 11 or 12 or 13 percent of par.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 minute more.

Mr. O'CONNOR. The authority I was quoting is Senator ADAMS, who made a statement on this matter on February 13, as found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at page 1393, as follows:

The South American nations, I think, with perhaps a single exception, are in default upon bonds and obligations due to citizens of the United States aggregating some $3,000,000,000.

Mr. KEAN. I hope the gentleman from Montana will support my amendment not to let the Export-Import Bank lend any money to any country that is in default to any citizen of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. O'CONNOR. I will say to the gentleman that I shall think it over.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GORE].

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, unfortunate though it may be, this bill, as has been said, is regarded by the press and has been accepted by the country, I fear, as a Finnish loan bill. Accurately it has been said that Finland is not mentioned in the bill. Neither is any other country mentioned.

The distinguished gentleman and my colleague on the committee who preceded me, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], agrees with that statement, and invites us to forget the Finnish loan angle and discuss the bill upon its merits. That challenge I accept. Prefacing that, I wish to say that Mr. Jones said that he would not consider the passage of this bill a mandate to make a loan to Finland. No commitment, he said, has been made to Finland other than that already made, quite apart from the consideration of the bill in question. Mr. Hackworth, representing the State Department, made two statements which I repeat to you. He said that a loan to Finland under existing circumstances by the provisions of this bill would not be a violation of international law. He said also that it would not be in violation of our Neutrality Act. With that, Mr. Chairman, I leave to the older and more learned of my colleagues in the field of international law, the discussion of the Finnish angle, and proceed to the challenge which I accept of my distinguished colleague from New Jersey.

The opposition of the minority Members appears to be to the entire provisions of this bill, with the exception of some proposed mandate to make a loan to Finland. The Export-Import Bank was organized in 1934 by Executive order, and, by subsequent legislative acts, it has been continued as an agency of the United States Government. Its capital stock is owned by the Government, and by the R. F. C. Of its $46,000,000 of capital stock, one million of common stock is owned by the Government and held in the name of the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Commerce in their respective official capacities. Forty-five million dollars of preferred stock is owned by the R. F. C. The Corporation is doing an international banking business, having as its purpose the aiding and facilitation of exports of American products. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] made the statement that we had appropriated $100,000,000. We have never appropriated anything to the Export-Import Bank, to my knowledge, other than for its administrative expenses. The net earnings of the bank over its life have been something over $5,000,000. Its net earnings was $2,344,776 in 1939. It has had no losses. It cannot be said, however, that no losses will occur. In all probability losses will occur, but it can be said now in high commendation that no loss has been sustained by the bank. I believe the nearest approach to a loss was in a loan to Spain, and in referring to this particular loan as a "loan to Spain," I commit the error ordinarily committed by us all when we refer to a loan to some corporation or person within a country as a loan to that country.

In this particular case Smith & Co., of Mayfield, Ky., sold to a purchaser in Spain $672,871.78 worth of tobacco. Such terms and such characteristics of the loan prevailed that the company could not finance the whole account. That company applied to the Export-Import Bank. The Export-Import Bank made the loan. All of the loan has been repaid except $46,530.46. Some say that the remainder will not be repaid. That may be true. The Export-Import Bank has to its credit on deposit that amount of Spanish currency. Of course, time will not permit a discussion of the economic and internal repercussions in Spain due to the civil war, but suffice it to say here that the present prospects are good for an eventual honoring and recognition and redemption of this currency by the present Spanish regime. Nevertheless, even though there are prospects now of a redemption of this currency, the Export-Import Bank has set up in its reserves a sufficient amount of money to offset and write off this $46,530.46 which has not yet been collected. Mind you, this $46,530.46 is not shown in the net earnings which I have recited to you as being over $5,000,000.

Conceivably, I could be of some service to the membership by taking an example.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORE. Yes.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. The gentleman states that we have made Federal appropriations for administrative expenses of this bank. He states next that they made a profit of one million or two million dollars. Has any step been taken to repay advances made by the Federal Government in the way of appropriations for Federal administrative expenses, or are we to contribute that much to the profit of the bank?

Mr. GORE. I am glad the gentleman has asked that question. I beg to correct him in that I did not use the word "profit"; I used the words "net earnings." The bank is an agency of the Government itself. It is limited in time to 1941.

Mr. WHITE of Idaho. Are these profits covered back into the Treasury?

Mr. GORE. I decline to yield further until I have finished answering the gentleman's question. Whenever the agency is liquidated, whatever profit exists goes to its principal. Furthermore, the earnings on the preferred stock, $45,000,000 of the $46,000,000 of which is held by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, go to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which is another agency of the Federal Government.

In this example which I will take, I will not only take a typical example but I will take an actual example. In this case the Sorocobana Railroad, of Brazil, asked for bids for railroad equipment. The American Locomotive Sales Corporation, of New York, was the successful bidder. The terms of the loan were such that the American Locomotive Sales Corporation, of New York, did not feel itself justified in carrying the account. In fact, they said they were not financially able. The Sorocobana Railroad wanted an amortization schedule over a 4-year period. They applied, before they made their bid, to the Export-Import Bank. The Export-Import Bank made its investigations and tentatively made a commitment. The American corporation, the American manufacturer and exporter, upon that tentative commitment, made a bid. As I formerly said, he was the successful bidder. The contract was drawn. The notes were signed by the Sorocobana Railroad in favor of the American Locomotive Sales Corporation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GORE] has expired.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. GORE. Those notes were endorsed by the Bank of Brazil. They were then transmitted to the American Locomotive Sales Corporation. The American Locomotive Sales Corporation then sold the notes to the Export-Import Bank, with the American exporter participating to the extent of 35 percent—meaning by "participating" that the American Locomotive Sales Corporation assumed and carried 35 percent of the loan or account, itself; but being unable to finance the entire account, the Export-Import Bank purchased 65 percent of the paper. Payments on that account have been current. There has been no default. In fact, there is no defaulted loan in the entire operation of the bank.

I ask you, Mr. Chairman, why is that not sound business?

Some attention should be given to the argument that because the Government of Brazil, or the government of some other country, is in default with some of its bonds, that the security of the Bank of Brazil is no better endorsement than the Government itself. Logical though this may appear in theory, nevertheless it is fallacious in that a government can default and continue to be a nation, continue to be a people; but a bank can only default by closing its doors. In fact, only one loan has been made directly to a government. That was not directly, but enough so to say that it was a direct loan to a government. All the other loans have been to nationals or corporations or business institutions within the countries. They have had security or the endorsement of a bank within that country. Not only a bank within that country, but a responsible bank within that country.

Mr. POAGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORE. I yield.

Mr. POAGE. It seems to me I am getting a little confused here. Does the gentleman mean that the loans are made to an individual or a bank in the foreign nation? Are not the loans made to an American national or an American corporation that is selling the goods in the foreign nation and accepting foreign credits, which are then purchased by the Export-Import Bank?

Mr. GORE. I would be glad for the gentleman to apply his own interpretation to these facts. The paper is generally bought from the American exporters.

Mr. POAGE. That is right, but the American Export-Import Bank never makes a direct transaction with a foreign agency?

Mr. GORE. If the gentleman means that the money leaves America, it never does; and the bank does not make a direct contract with the foreign purchaser. The bank deals through the American exporter and buys paper from the American exporter which has been executed by foreign purchasers, with the proper endorsement.

Mr. POAGE. Do we also require endorsement of that paper from the American exporter?

Mr. GORE. I will be glad to answer that. In some cases they do; in some cases they do not. Further, in some cases we retain a vendor's lien upon the property sold. One of the most beneficial things that the bank has engaged in is a line of credit to small exporters.

I hold in my hand, which you can see, two sheets of small corporations which have been given a line of credit, with only one exception, of from $2,000 to $10,000. The line of credit is revolving, in that these companies can continue to use that line of credit so long as it has outstanding at no time more than its line of credit. For instance, the Anglo-American Trading Corporation has been given a line of credit of $10,000. The bank has disbursed to that corporation over its operation $62,000. All of that has been repaid except $1,160. It is still operating. The line of credit is still in effect. Why is that not beneficial to that small company and to the country as well?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD].

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Mr. Chairman, we are faced with a very difficult problem today. There is an overwhelming desire in this country to aid Finland in her gallant fight to save her homeland, but there is just as strong a feeling that we must take no steps that would involve us in foreign entanglements or violate our neutrality. The question is, How can we help Finland and at the same time maintain our strict neutrality?

In my opinion, the pending bill, because it does not include implements of war, would in no way violate our neutrality, but I am wondering if it will accomplish its purpose in bringing the necessary aid to Finland. This raises the question whether or not we can make a direct loan to Finland without any conditions attached as to its use. I addressed this question to the Honorable Cordell Hull, Secretary of State, and received the following reply:

FEBRUARY 23, 1940.

DEAR MR. CHIPERFIELD: I am in receipt of your letter of February 16 inquiring whether, if the Congress should, under existing conditions, appropriate a sum of money for Finland without any condition attached as to its use, such a loan would violate our Neutrality Act, the Constitution, any domestic law, treaty, or obligation of the United States under the law of nations.

The Neutrality Act would not become operative as to Finland unless, as stated in section 1 thereof, the President should issue a proclamation after he "or the Congress, by concurrent resolution, should find that there exists a state of war * * * and that it is necessary to promote the security or preserve the peace of the United States or to protect the lives of citizens of the United States." No such proclamation has been issued by the President.

While section 7 of the act prohibiting the making of loans or the extension of credits to belligerent governments is not by its terms applicable to this Government, there is authority for the proposition that the making of loans for general purposes by a neutral government to a belligerent government is contrary to the principles of neutrality.

The Convention on Maritime Neutrality between the United States and other American republics concluded at Habana in 1928 states, in article 16, that a neutral is forbidden to grant loans or to open credits for a belligerent during the progress of war, but that "credits that a neutral state may give to facilitate the sale or exportation of its food products and raw materials are not included in this prohibiion."

The suggestion contained in the President's letters of January 16, 1940, to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives was that Congress might authorize an increase in the revolving credit fund of the Export-Import Bank and authorize the "Reconstruction Finance Corporation to purchase loans and securities from the Export-Import Bank to enable it to finance exportation of agricultural surpluses and manufactured products, not including implements of war." It will be noted that the President's suggestion was confined to exportation of agricultural surpluses and manufactured products and specifically excluded "implements of war." He also stated that, if the applications for loans were acted upon favorably by the Congress, the matter would be kept "within the realm of our neutrality laws and our neutrality policies."

I know of no provision in our Constitution prohibiting Congress from making an appropriation of the character referred to, nor do I know of any statutory provision that would be contravened, but even if there were some inconsistent provision in existing law, it would, in my opinion, be superseded by our present act making an appropriation for the purpose mentioned by you.

Such an appropriation for purposes stated by the President would not run counter to provisions in any treaty to which the United States is a party, nor would it, in my opinion, run counter to the law of nations.

Sincerely yours,

CORDELL HULL.

From this letter I reached the conclusion that if such a loan were made there would be no violation of our Neutrality Act because the President has not found there exists a state of war between Finland and Russia, and it is not necessary to do so to promote the security and peace of the United States, or to protect the lives of citizens of the United States.

However, there is no question, but it is a well-recognized principle of international law, that a neutral is forbidden to grant loans for general purposes, or open credits to a belligerent during the progress of war. Whether we would be violating this rule of international law in making a loan to Finland for general purposes would seem to depend on whether Finland and Russia are belligerents, as defined by international law. If we consider that Finland and Russia are belligerents under international law, then we cannot make a loan without restrictions as to its use. On the other hand, if they are not belligerents, we can make them a loan for general purposes without violating our neutrality.

Upon this question whether Finland and Russia are belligerents under existing circumstances I have consulted Dr. Carl L. W. Meyer, of the International Law Division of the Congressional Library, and he has reached the conclusion they are not belligerents. His letter is as follows:

Having reference to our conversation last Saturday in respect to the international relationship between the United States on the one hand and Finland and Russia on the other, I am in a position to state that the Government of the United States has not recognized thus far that war exists between Finland and Russia. Nor has any declaration of war been issued by Finland or Russia. Officially, therefore, the relationship between the United States and the said countries is quite different from what it would be if a state of belligerency had been recognized.

You are well aware, I am sure, that the existence of a state of war will call into operation the international law of neutrality; the right of visit and search on the part of the belligerents and the duty of neutrals to submit to it; and other rights and duties incidental to the international law of war.

I am enclosing a copy of a report recently prepared by me entitled "Loans or Contributions of Money by Neutrals to Belligerent Nations." As I indicated in the introductory note, the references contained in this report are applicable to belligerents and neutrals and have no direct bearing, at the present time, at least, on the relationship between the United States and Finland or Russia, since the Government of the United States, as stated above, has thus far not recognized that a state of belligerency exists. The said references merely refer to the rights and duties of neutrals in respect of loans to belligerents.

I am also enclosing a statement concerning opinions of authorities on international law on belligerency, for which you have asked me.

If his views are correct, then there would be no reason why this Congress, so far as international law is concerned, should not make a direct loan to Finland without any conditions attached as to its use.

There seems to be a clear distinction between undeclared wars and recognized war so far as neutrals are concerned. Strange as it may seem, there can be an armed conflict and still not be a recognized war. If neither of the parties admit there is a legal state of war and neither exercises belligerent rights against neutrals, they need not necessarily be considered as belligerents. Just because there is an armed conflict going on between two nations, which everyone knows to exist, is no reason why our country should recognize a state of belligerency between those nations unless it is for our best interest to do so.

This distinction has been recognized by Dr. Thomas H. Healy, professor of international law and dean of the school of foreign service of Georgetown University, on pages 71 and 72 of the hearings before the Committee on Foreign Affairs. He said:

You have before you proposals to include warfare or undeclared wars as distinguished from recognized wars. Such warfare is neither new nor illegal, and we ourselves have indulged in it. As far as neutrals are concerned, there is a vital difference between warfare and war. Unless at least one of the parties admits that there is a legal state of war, neither exercises belligerent rights against neutrals.

I might say that the hearings have been available only today, but Mr. R. Walton Moore, Counselor for the State Department, in his testimony before the committee made the same definition. His statement will be found on page 57 of the hearings.

Continuing Dr. Healy's statement, he said further:

As the Far Eastern conflict has precipitated this discussion, we should remember that not a single nation on the face of the globe (not even including China itself) considers that conflict as war, nor has either China or Japan attempted to exercise belligerent rights; that is, the right to stop, search, and seize neutral ships and cargoes on the high seas.

Mr. Green H. Hackworth, legal adviser to the Secretary of State, in his testimony before the Foreign Relations Committee, page 39, said in a reply to a question from Senator JOHNSON of California:

I think, Senator, you have to take into account another situation which may or may not, in your judgment, be persuasive one way or the other; that is, that both Soviet Russia and Finland have said in unqualified terms that they are not at war. Soviet Russia said that to the League of Nations. Finland said it to the Government of the United States. Each has said that it is not making war on the other party.

Again, Senator JOHNSON of California asked this question:

Do you think we fool anybody by saying that countries are not at war when actually they are shooting down one another all day long?

Mr. HACKWORTH. Of course, you do not; you do not fool anybody by that, but you still have the question as to whether we are going gratuitously to say that they are at war and thereby circumscribe our rights—whether there is any particular reason for doing that.

Senator JOHNSON of California. There is one reason for doing it, and a very good reason; that is, it is a fact.

Mr. HACKWORTH. It raises still a further question, whether we have to recognize every fact, or whether we can pass over the fact, if it is to our interest not to recognize it, if we are under no obligation, no compulsion, to recognize it.

And again on page 41, in reply to this question from Senator BARKLEY:

To what extent has this new form of war, this undeclared war, modified the rules of international law?

Mr. HACKWORTH. I do not know that you could say that it has modified the rules of international law, because under international law a neutral is not obligated to recognize a state of belligerency between two other countries which expressly deny belligerency, unless his interests are such as to make it impelling that he should do so.

At no time has the United States recognized a state of belligerency between Finland and Russia. Therefore there seems to be no legal reason why a direct loan could not be given to Finland under present conditions without restrictions as to its use. While such a right apparently exists, the wisdom of adopting such a policy of granting loans to other nations, when there is an actual armed conflict existing but when a state of belligerency has not been recognized, to be used for the purchase of war materials in this country is an entirely different question. We do know, however, that Finland needs small arms, ammunition, shells, and airplanes, and, although she would be grateful to receive a loan to obtain raw material and food products, that is not her crying need at the moment.

We do know that on December 13, 1939, a $10,000,000 loan to Finland was approved, and yet after more than 2½ months she has not used all of this loan. We do know that we are attempting by this bill to appropriate $100,000,000 to loan Finland $20,000,000 for materials that would probably not help her win the war.

But let us remember this: While we may differ as to the best course to follow, we as private citizens can continue to make any gift or donation to Finland we desire until the President invokes the Neutrality Act, when section 7 of that act, prohibiting any person from making any loan or extending any credit to any government named in such proclamation, will be in full force and effect. I hope we will continue to make these gifts.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON].

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I shall support the pending resolution. When all the facts relative to the resolution are thoroughly known and understood I cannot understand why anyone should oppose it. I have heard only two suggestions made by any who questioned the wisdom of the legislation. I heard someone say that it might be a step toward war and that being for peace he would, therefore, oppose the resolution. I heard another indicate that he might vote against the resolution because he felt that the distressed condition in this country and of agriculture in particular called for the expenditure of these funds at home rather than abroad, and for that reason, believing that charity should begin at home, we should not appropriate money to be spent abroad. I want to discuss these two questions briefly because there is a good and adequate answer to both, and when thoroughly understood neither objection is tenable.

As to the objection that this is a step toward war, I say that this fear is founded upon a misapprehension or misunderstanding of international law and of our own neutrality law and our own policy in dealing with other governments. As was just said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD], who read a letter from Secretary Hull, this resolution as it is drafted violates neither our neutrality law nor our rights as a neutral under international law. We all understand, of course, that until our own neutrality law is invoked its provisions do not apply. Our neutrality law provides that when the President or the Congress finds that a state of war exists between foreign states and that it is necessary to promote the security of our own country or to protect the lives of our own citizens, then it is their duty to invoke it. Then, of course, all of its provisions are applicable and no loan, of course, could be made. Our neutrality law has not been invoked in the conflict between Russia and Finland and is therefore not applicable.

Under international law, however, which is always the law applicable to all countries, I may say that I have made some investigation with reference to this question, and the resolution as drafted does not contravene international law in the slightest particular, and does not violate our rights as a neutral, or subject our Government to the charge that we have acted unneutral under international law by the passage of this resolution.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHIPERFIELD] bases his proposition upon the ground that there being no declared state of war between Finland and Russia, neither is a belligerent under international law and, therefore, any loan could be made. I do not fall out with the gentleman about that, and I think that is eminently correct, but I go further. If anyone should take the position that that is farfetched, that it is a technicality, that while war has not been declared, yet an actual state of war exists between these countries, Russia and Finland, and both countries are belligerents, therefore, a loan under international law should not be made to either—I say that under international law even though a state of war had been actually declared between these two countries and a legal state of war did exist, the resolution is so framed as not to contravene international law.

The resolution as reported by the committee clearly safeguards this contention, because it provides in express language that no loan shall be made in violation of international law as interpreted by the Department of State. So we need have no fears, and even the most timid and the most apprehensive should have no fears of our becoming involved in war. Such fears are groundless, because the resolution itself provides specifically that loans shall not be made which violate the rights of neutrals under international law as interpreted by our State Department. This ground of objection, therefore, goes out. I am opposed to war, and would take no step to involve us in war, and this resolution does not do so.

We come now to the other objection that this loan should not be made because of distressed conditions at home, because agriculture and industry are suffering, and that charity should begin at home. The complete answer to this objection, I say, is the fact that this will help agriculture, this will help industry, this will help our domestic business, for the expenditures are not to be made in foreign countries but in our own country for the buying of our own products.

The creation of the Export-Import Bank was primarily to dispose of the surpluses of agricultural products that may have a depressing effect upon the current prices of such products, and the Corporation is authorized and directed to make loans in such amounts as may in its judgment be necessary for the purpose of financing sales of such surpluses in the markets of foreign countries in which such sales cannot be financed in the normal course of commerce.

The Export-Import Bank, created in 1935, in existence now for 5 years, was designed primarily to encourage and facilitate exports and imports between our country and foreign countries. This resolution merely increases by $100,000,000 the amount that can be loaned by the Export-Import Bank, and provides that not more than $20,000,000 shall be loaned to any one country, in addition to loans heretofore made. Anyone who votes against this bill on the ground that he is fearful it might hurt our country is not casting an intelligent vote, because it will help us, every dollar of all these loans will be spent in this country and it will facilitate the sale and export of the products of our own country, and that is what we need at the present time more than any other one thing. There is no reason why anyone should oppose this resolution.

Mr. Chairman, some have said that the resolution should be specifically designed so that it will direct that a loan shall be made to Finland. Why do you raise that question? If under the resolution an authorization is made whereby Finland may secure a loan and if, as testified in the hearings, it is contemplated a loan will be made if a proper showing is presented, why is it necessary to specifically designate Finland or any other country? The best policy to pursue, as we have done heretofore, is to designate no country, but leave to the Export-Import Bank the making of all such loans.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] argued the question on the ground we were delegating power. If these loans are to be made we have to delegate to some agency the question of the terms, conditions, and provisions under which the loan can be made. We can more safely trust than any other agency, the Export-Import Bank, headed by Mr. Jesse Jones, who, in my judgment, is one of the most astute and able businessmen in this country, a great administrator, and who has made a success of every task he has ever undertaken. The Export-Import Bank has demonstrated its efficiency so ably, and it is so well managed by Mr. Jones, that I think it is farfetched to say that you are against the bill, because Finland is not specifically mentioned. We can trust Mr. Jones and the Export-Import Bank to deal fairly and justly with Finland, with which we are in sympathy, and want to help.

Mr. SOUTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SOUTH. Is it not a fact there is no legislation involved here? The Export-Import Bank has already been set up; it is already functioning, and Mr. Jones testified it has shown some profit up to date. So this is not a matter of legislation.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. The gentleman is right. There is no legislation involved here. It is simply a question of an increase in the amount of loans that may be made by one of our agencies that has been very well managed heretofore. We put this matter into the hands of an agency that is now in existence and now in operation, and I think the pending resolution should command the support of everyone, regardless of whether you are an isolationist or an internationalist, and regardless of whether you sympathize with one faction or the other. If you are a good American and want to help our business, while at the same time not violate any provisions of the law, you will support this resolution. I cannot find any just ground upon which anyone should oppose it. [Applause.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALLEN].

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am one of those who, until an hour ago, thought that a portion of the funds which we are considering this afternoon would be lent to the Government of Finland. When I express my own disappointment over the revelations which have been made here I believe I speak the feelings of a vast segment of the American people who, through the press and the pronouncements of public officials, have been led to believe that the bill now under consideration would eventuate in a loan to the Finnish Government.

Mr. Chairman, as the Representatives of a nation that owes its very existence to the timely aid rendered by France 160 years ago, we are conducting ourselves in an untenable manner. Had it not been for French military and economic aid in 1776, there is grave question whether we would be assembled here today as the Representatives of a free people.

Had it not been for France our independence would have been lost altogether or long delayed. If Louis XVI, Beaumarchais, and Vergennes had placed their principles and sentiments on a cake of ice, as the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER] recommended that we do in the matter now before us, earlier this afternoon, there would have been no Yorktown, and very probably no Constitution and no free democracy in this hemisphere. We needed the 35,000,000 livres which the French Government loaned to us at that time with no strings tied to them. Back in 1776 we needed the 10,000,000 livres which came to us from France as an outright gift. We needed the clothing which France gave us for for 20,000 ragged Continentals. The brass cannon and the guns, as well as 90 percent of all the gunpowder which was used in our Revolutionary War, came from France as either a gift or in return for credits which had been established on the other side. A fleet of 40 French vessels, if you please, came to our assistance when we were hard pressed and 47,000 French soldiers and sailors aided Washington in his struggle for independence. If it had not been for this aid there probably would be no United States today, and had it not been for the help rendered us by France under circumstances which are very similar to those which obtain on the Karelian Isthmus our Continental Army would have been defeated and the cause of liberty retarded indefinitely.

As I sat here during the course of this debate while the subject of a loan to Finland has been discussed, I gazed toward that picture of Lafayette on the left of the Speaker, and realized that that portrait hangs in its place because of our respect for that man and what he stood for. We honor him and exalt him for the aid he gave us when we as 13 struggling colonies were in need. We have rendered to him a distinction accorded to no other man except the father of our country, Washington. Even Lincoln's picture does not appear on the walls of this Chamber. Why do we honor Lafayette in this manner? Because he dared do the very things which we are flunking on this afternoon if we do not set aside a sum of money for the free and unrestricted aid of the little Finnish republic. [Applause.]

I do not feel that we are worthy of a great heritage if we equivocate and delay in this matter any longer.

We have the right as Representatives of 130,000,000 American people, and the American people themselves are entitled to a clear-cut debate on whether we are going to lend money to Finland. We have delayed long enough. I for one am going to support the amendment which will be offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], and later an amendment which will be introduced by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EATON] to give to Finland an unrestricted loan with which they can purchase the necessary military equipment to defend themselves. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, this is not merely a Finnish-Russian war which is raging in Europe. There are deep principles involved which affect the whole world. This is a conflict between the principles of freedom, liberty, democracy, and Christianity on the one hand, and dictatorship, ruthless aggression, and atheism on the other.

Those things which we hold dear, the principles on which this Nation has been founded, those institutions which Washington and his ragged little army fought for, bled for, and died for will suffer if Russia is victorious over Finland.

I have heard it said that the Finnish affair is none of our business. It has been prophesied that a loan to Finland may involve us eventually in the conflict now raging on the Karelian Isthmus. I wonder when I hear such idiocies uttered what kind of a world we will live in tomorrow, what kind of a world our children will live in, if Russia conquers Finland and then marches onward, conquering other little republics as she is bound to do on the Scandinavian Peninsula. If the torch of liberty is snuffed out in any free nation it is bound to burn dimmer right here at home. Liberty and freedom cannot be murdered in any part of the world without those principles suffering a severe set-back here in America. Those institutions on which this Nation is founded cannot be shattered in other nations of the world without our suffering here in America indirectly because of their destruction.

What will be the effect on our institutions if Russia conquers Finland, as she will do if aid is not forthcoming? In the first place, it will certainly encourage those subversive groups here at home which have caused us so much trouble in recent years. Certainly they will receive encouragement from abroad, and their attempts to undermine our free institutions and this democratic form of government will be more open and bolder than they have been in the past.

Some day, if this Red scourge continues to ride roughshod over Europe, we will be faced with the issue. If Russia and Germany conquer the democracies, you know what the results will be here in America. We will spend untold millions strengthening our own defenses. Where we are now asked to loan only the price of one battleship, we will be forced to spend millions and millions for a whole new fleet with which to defend these shores. A larger Navy, an enlarged Air Force, and an increased Army are bound to result here in America if Russia and Nazi Germany win their respective wars in Europe today.

There is no difference between domestic and international gangsterism. When gangsterism rears its ugly head in any community in the United States, we law-abiding citizens immediately seek to defend ourselves by increasing our police force, and other agencies of law and order. And so it is when gangsters of the Hitler-Stalin type crush the liberties and freedom of human beings beneath their feet that the peaceful countries of the world in self-protection increase their defenses in proportion to the force of the exterior threat. American citizens who feel no responsibility for the plight of Finland today will feel otherwise if Russia is victorious and when they are forced to pay the tax bill for steadily increasing defensive armaments.

An unrestricted loan to Finland at this time for military supplies and other purposes will be no breach of international law. International law is not violated because Russia herself has insisted that a state of war does not exist. That, of course, is a technicality, but Russia having proclaimed to the League of Nations that she is not waging war on Finland could not accuse us of violating the precepts of international law if we gave Finland an outright loan.

Under the provisions of the legislation which we are now debating, if any loan is made to Finland it will be for civil commodities only. If other nations restricted their loans to Finland with these limitations, the little Republic would have been gobbled up before this. We in America applaud Sweden for aiding Finland with military supplies, yet we shrink from doing the very thing which we so vocally commend in others. If we are justified in loaning Finland money for civilian commodities, we are equally justified under the same principle in selling her military supplies.

I shall support those amendments to this bill which will guarantee a forthright loan to Finland, unrestricted and unencumbered, so that it may be used for those purposes which in the judgment of her leaders Finland feels are most necessary. When I support those amendments I shall be motivated by the same reasoning which brought Lafayette, Von Steuben, Kosciusko, and Pulaski to the defense of this Nation when it was struggling for its independence and for the freedom of its people. In my carefully considered judgment a loan to Finland at this time will go far toward perpetuating those fundamental principles in which we profess to believe so strongly. If Finland can hold fast on the Karelian Isthmus, democratic institutions, the sanctity of the church, and the dignity of mankind in all corners of the earth will be more secure.

Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that the Fish and Eaton amendments to this bill will be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARRY].

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Chairman, with all due respect to my friend and colleague from Pennsylvania, I cannot get very excited when he brings in the distinguished Marquis de Lafayette and reminds us so emotionally of what transpired back in the days when this country was founded. If my memory serves me right, the French were engaged in a little unpleasantness with their own traditional enemy, and while they were an ally of ours, at the same time we served a rather useful purpose as an ally of theirs. If we were indebted to them, I feel that we more than balanced the budget of the equities back in 1918 and thereabouts.

This theory that if Russia conquers little Finland that then the great communistic wolf is going to spread all over Scandinavia and all over the world has a certain appeal, but I cannot help but remember that for 700 years little Finland was a part of Sweden until, back about 1809, brave little Finland became a grand duchy of the Czar. From my humble democratic outlook I cannot see any great difference between the government of the czars and its imperialism and the Communist Government and its imperialism and its dictatorship. Unquestionably the Czar had more tolerance with his subjects in a religious sense, but I believe he gave them less bread than even Stalin does. There is little to choose between them. During the 100 years from 1809 to 1917, when Finland was part of Russia, we were in no danger, and the situation was not greatly different. While I am rooting with all my heart for Finland, I am rooting still more for the peace and security of this country. I do not believe the impact will be so great that we will suffer disaster as a result of the conquest of Finland.

I want it clearly understood that if I vote for this bill I am not doing so because I believe we are under any obligation to lend any money to Finland.

It seems to me, as a matter of common sense, if someone lends me money when I need it and I use that money for a good purpose and I pay it back, I should be grateful to the lender rather than the lender owing some obligation to me. [Applause.] It has always been that way, and the only difference in respect to Finland is that our former Allies and other countries welshed on their payments and made no attempt to meet them; thereby, because Finland fulfilled its obligations, it achieves a unique position and hence some people think that we should start cheering for Finland and make our frontier out on the Karelian Isthmus.

If we vote for this bill on the basis stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALLEN], then by all the rules of reason, if Hitler decides to invade Switzerland or Belgium or Holland—grand little republics that have done more to build up this great Nation than little Finland—then by all the rules we should step in and make loans to those countries. There is no real difference except that Belgium is affected by the Johnson Act, because it still owes us money. However, that act does not apply to either Switzerland or Holland. Then we get the camel's nose under the tent, and then will inevitably come the repeal of the Johnson Act itself.

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARRY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. The gentleman does not stop to consider that if the Russians are stopped at Finland's borders, these aggressors will not dare commit other acts of conquest.

Mr. BARRY. I have no authentic information about that possibility, and, by the way, the Government of Sweden is not saying that the Russians want to go beyond Finland.

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARRY. I yield.

Mr. SOUTH. The gentleman understands that under this very act these loans will only be made after they have been closely scrutinized by the best financial minds in America and after they have been passed upon as being sound loans, and would the gentleman object to such a loan being made to Holland or Belgium if they were invaded later on?

Mr. BARRY. Not on that basis, and in this connection I want to quote Mr. Jones.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois rose.

Mr. BARRY. I yield to the gentlewoman from Illinois.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. I was just going to remind the gentleman from New York that when we fight communism we do not just fight Russia or some other nation. We are fighting a sort of leprous theory of government, and we can win a war and still lose by being overcome by communism in our own country.

Mr. BARRY. And I believe we should fight communism in this country, but when we go to fighting it up in Finland we might as well start in Mexico, because we should consider first the enemy nearest home.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. I think the gentleman has spoken good sense and sound jurisprudence.

Mr. BARRY. I thank you.

I have great confidence in Jesse Jones, the Administrator of the R. F. C., and the man who is going to decide whether or not this is a sound loan; and if I do vote for this bill, I am going to vote for it on his testimony that this is simply an authorization to make loans to Finland up to $20,000,000; not a direction, but an authorization, leaving it to his judgment at the time, and Mr. Jones has said that he will not lend the money unless he thinks Finland can pay it back. That may be funny to the gentleman here [referring to Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin, who laughed], for I differed with Mr. Jones on the Chinese loan about a year ago, but now I am convinced Mr. Jones was very sound in making that loan, and I am willing to leave it to his discretion and take his word if he thinks Finland is going to be able to pay, viewing it purely on a commercial basis. You cannot help them on these things in any other way. You cannot engage in an emotional campaign like my friend the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALLEN]. You have got to regard this thing on a commercial basis and not on a purely sentimental basis. I am inclined at this time, the way the bill is now drawn, to go along with it on the assurance of Mr. Jones.

In conclusion I want to say that I believe the Export-Import Bank is one of the best vehicles we have ever created in this Congress to promote our foreign trade, whether it be with Latin America or with Scandinavia, and the balance of trade is well in our favor with the Scandinavian countries; and it will be purely on that basis that I expect to go along with this bill.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARRY. I yield.

Mr. HINSHAW. I have been trying to find out what restrictions the chairman of the Rules Committee was referring to in connection with private banks in making these long-term loans to foreign individuals, nationals, corporations, or governments. He said, as I remember it, that the private banks were not able or did not make such lons. Does the gentleman know the restrictions that may be placed on private banks that would prevent them from making such loans?

Mr. BARRY. I did not hear his statement and I do not know of any restrictions, but I assume that private banks would not make this type of loan as a purely commercial proposition, and the only way I can distinguish it to my satisfaction is that when we make loans to a country, we are doing it for the general welfare and not on a particular item for immediate profit, but rather to build up our balance of trade with Scandinavia or Latin America, for instance. I do not know whether I have answered the gentleman's question or not.

Mr. HINSHAW. I was just asking about the specific restrictions on private banks.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARRY. I yield.

Mr. SPENCE. I think Mr. Jones said that in the sales of heavy capital goods to those countries, they wanted credits over 6 or 7 years and the ordinary banker would not take care of them for that reason.

Mr. HINSHAW. You say he would not or could not?

Mr. BARRY. Well, he would not, anyhow.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 minute more.

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Chairman, instead of getting into a state of hysteria about ideological conflicts, I think this Export-Import Bank can be made to function so that we can compete with our commercial rivals, such as Great Britain, Germany, Japan, and others, so that we can build up our trade in this hemisphere and not be trying to extend our boundary lines to the Scandinavian Isthmus. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON].

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, in helping Finland we are giving assistance to a nation which unwaveringly stands for democracy and western civilization. Finland's union with Sweden during 700 years, up to 1808, accounts for the fact that the social and political structures in Finland have developed along the same lines as in the other northern countries, although Finland during all that time retained her own character and was thoroughly Finnish. Already at that time Finland's boundaries toward the east, toward Russia, were, on the whole, drawn up more than 300 years ago. During the time Finland was in union with Russia, from 1808 till 1917, as an autonomous grand duchy, the frontier between her and Russia proper was clearly defined and fixed.

When Finland became independent in 1917 she took no territory that was not Finnish. There are no minorities—particularly no Russian minorities—in Finland.

Three times has Soviet Russia solemnly pledged herself to respect Finland's independence and her frontiers. The first time was in 1917, when the Soviet Russian Government recognized Finland's independence. Next was through the Peace Treaty of Tarttu in 1920 and the third time in 1932, when there was entered into between Finland and Russia a nonaggression treaty, which in 1934 was renewed for 10 years.

Russia has violated all pledges then made, although Finland's policy toward her great neighbor to the east has ever been to maintain good and peaceful relations. Finland never joined any bloc of the big European powers. She was always most anxious to maintain, like the other Scandinavian states, a policy of strict neutrality, and never once did she in any way threaten Russia or any other state.

Despite this, Russia has launched against Finland a most ruthless, brutal, and unprovoked aggression. She has taken her part of Poland and has secured control over the Baltic states of Lithuania, Latvia, and Estonia, from where she now launches her air-raid attacks against the defenseless civilian population of Finland.

Russia, early in the autumn, proposed to Finland a number of most wanton and impossible demands. She demanded, among other things, that Finland cede to her the city of Hanko, in the southwesternmost part of the country, for a naval and military base; that Finland give up a part of her territory on the Karelian Isthmus; and that she destroy her main defense line there, the Mannerheim line; furthermore, that she cede a number of islands in the eastern part of the Gulf of Finland and also a part of her possessions in Petsamo, on the Arctic Sea. There is not the slightest reason nor justification for these Russian demands. It is pure imperialism and the application of the rule of force as against right. To give Russia the port of Hanko, or what she demanded on the Karelian Isthmus, would have been to open the gateway for Russian penetration into Finland and to sacrifice the country's integrity, independence, and neutrality. However, Finland was and is willing to meet the Russian demands as far as is possible. Last fall Finland was disposed to cede to Russia some of the islands in the Gulf of Finland, outside of Leningrad, although those islands have since time immemorial belonged to Finland and have a purely Finnish population. She was further willing to remove somewhat the frontier on the Karelian Isthmus without, however, destroying or endangering Finland's natural line of defense.

Russia bluntly rejected the Finnish concessions. She launched against Finland a campaign of blackmail, lies, and vituperation, pretending that Finnish artillery had fired over the Russian border, although the Finns, in order to avoid all untoward incidents, had withdrawn their artillery so that the Russian border was out of its firing range.

On the 30th of November Russia, without a declaration of war, attacked Finland, directing these attacks not only against the Finnish troops and defense lines, but also against unfortified and open cities and places, where already in the first days hundreds of civilians, particularly women and children, were killed, the able-bodied men having been called to the colors.

Finland at once accepted the idea of mediation when the American Government, on the same day as hostilities broke out, offered its good offices to settle the dispute. Russia bluntly rejected the offer. Finland was also fully disposed to agree to the American Government's appeal that open and unfortified cities and places be not bombed. Russia turned down this appeal as pointless.

Russia's real intention toward Finland appeared in all its ruthlessness when 2 days after the attacks had begun, the Soviet Government set up a so-called Finnish Communist Government. As far as I am informed, not a single member of this government is a Finnish citizen, but all of them Communists, who have lived for many years in Soviet Russia. By setting up this puppet government Russia showed what she aims at: To introduce totalitarian Communist rule in Finland, to destroy Finland's democratic system of government and to incorporate the country into the Soviet Union.

Present hostilities in Finland are from the point of view of international law, of an extraordinary nature, most aptly to be compared with the Japanese attack upon China. It is not a war in the sense of international law. Russia has not declared war upon Finland, nor has Finland upon Russia. Furthermore, Russia pretends to be on the most friendly terms with the puppet government she set up and which resides somewhere on the frontier, or on Russian territory, but is without the slightest support in Finland. The hostilities in Finland do not fall under the stipulations of our neutrality legislation nor can the general rules of international law be applied to the present conflict. What goes on in Finland is an absolutely unprovoked and unwarranted aggression, and every third party has the right, without being dragged into the conflict, to take such financial and other peaceful measures as it may deem fit in order to assist the victim and to contribute to the maintenance of justice and order in the international world.

We have taken the same attitude in giving China our help through the credit granted her a few years ago. And, may I emphasize that in this respect there is no difference between a loan given a foreign government for military purposes and a credit granted to be used otherwise. Both are assistance and support given that government. It is maintaining an obsolete and unwarranted rule to pretend that neutrality implies absolute passivity. Even a neutral country must have the right, without resorting to war, to do its part to uphold morality and decency in international relations.

Finland has shown that she can resist the aggressor, and over and over again she has given proof of her firm decision to do so in the future. But it is evident that a nation of a little more than three and one-half million cannot in the long run successfully resist an aggressor that is 50 times more powerful in number and resources, and which has no lack of modern instruments of destruction, even though it does not get material help from abroad.

Finland has always been a peaceful nation. During the 20 years of her independence she has made wonderful progress in developing her economic life upon a sound and firm basis. Her industries have grown, her agriculture has expanded and her foreign trade more than doubled. Her yearly exports are nearly $200,000,000, and her national income reached, in 1937, about $600,000,000. At the same time she has honorably and consistently followed a policy of paying off her foreign debts. It is calculated that during the period 1932–37 Finland redeemed foreign bonds to an amount exceeding $125,000,000, and in this country alone she at the same time paid off debts to an amount of about $90,000,000. I think that we all appreciate this honorable policy of hers. But it must be evident that in following this honorable program Finland could not create any considerable balances abroad. Had she not been most scrupulous in fulfilling her international obligations and in paying her debts, she would now have ample balances abroad in foreign currencies. Russia has not paid us 1 cent of her debts since the World War, but sold us her gold at enormous profits, and can now buy what she needs in this country. Finland has paid her debts both to private creditors and to the United States Treasury, hence has no balances here and can therefore not buy the different commodities she most urgently needs. In refusing credit to Finland we thus directly favor Russia.

Finland needs, immediately and urgently, arms and munitions, guns and shells, airplanes and antiaircraft guns. She needs foodstuffs, raw materials, and manufactured goods. We can help her in all these respects without creating any precedent. Let us remember that Finland's front is not a part of the general front in the European war. Finland has been given help by Sweden, Norway, England, France, Italy, and also from other countries, but she must have more help than they can give.

The sympathy of this country is overwhelmingly in favor of Finland, and there have been put forward different proposals in order to give her the assistance public opinion in this country most unanimously urges us to give.

It is here proposed that the capital of the Export-Import Bank be increased by one hundred millions and out of this reserve grant Finland a credit of twenty millions in addition to the ten millions which were loaned her in December after the outbreak of hostilities. This credit would be granted like the previous ten millions, exclusively for the purchase in this country of agricultural surpluses and other commodities. There is no doubt that Finland needs much in the way of food, clothing, and so forth. Such a credit would be highly useful to her, provided the sum is adequate and the conditions satisfactory. The sum of twenty millions in addition to the previous ten millions ought, in any event, to be increased. But the restrictions placed upon her make it impossible for Finland to get from us the arms she needs to protect her defenseless civilian population and to save the Finnish Nation from enslavement.

Finland fights fearlessly, not only for her own existence but also for the principles of liberty and democracy. Her defeat would mean the defeat of all the ideals which she shares with us. Her annihilation would completely change the situation all over Europe, giving the totalitarian states complete control, not only over the Baltic Sea but over northern Europe and in the Balkans as well. Such a development could not but also affect our country, and in the economic field it would have a most detrimental effect. Finland and the other Scandinavian countries have always been good friends and customers, ever faithful supporters of sound and normal principles in all international relations.

In the interest of free government and for the maintenance of civilization and the preservation of the ideals for which this country stands, we must see to it that Finland gets from us the help in arms, materials, and financial resources she needs and which we can give without endangering our own position or running the risk of being dragged into the European conflict. That, of course, must be avoided at all costs.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes, to my old friend.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. The testimony of Mr. Jesse Jones before the Senate committee stated that Norway had asked for a loan of $10,000,000 under this, and that Sweden had also asked for a loan. Does the gentleman think it would be wise to make loans to Norway and Sweden?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes. I think if Russia secures control of the Scandinavian Peninsula, Europe will inevitably go totalitarian. That may be good news to some, but not to me. It would be a tragedy of the first magnitude were the British Empire, as such, to be destroyed, and I am satisfied it would mean the end of democratic and Christian government in France, the Balkans, and all Europe.

There are times when I become so indignant over the way Britain searches our ships; over the way she violates the rights of neutral nations and her disregard for international law, that I could grab the old squirrel rifle off the wall and go onto a little war of my own. However, when I think of the stabilizing influence of that mighty empire I realize that its continued existence is necessary to the preservation of democracy and representative government. On that score I am willing to overlook, although reluctantly, her outrageous conduct in violating the rights of neutral nations. After all, my main concern is the preservation of representative and Christian government. To that creed all loyal Americans subscribe wholeheartedly and without reservations.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Then the gentleman believes in these loans to Norway and Sweden?

Mr. KNUTSON. I believe in these loans in the same way that I believe in the loan that France made to us back in Revolutionary days when we were fighting for independence. That was one of the best investments that France ever made. It resulted in the establishment of a democracy in France, if I remember my history correctly. This loan will result in the preservation of democracy in northern Europe, and not alone in northern Europe, but in the Balkans as well. It does not require a keen student of history to foresee that once Russia triumphs in northern Europe, the entire continent and perhaps all other continents, with the possible exception of the Western Hemisphere, will become totalitarian.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. Is it not true that at the time that Finland was a part of Sweden that they were willingly a part of Sweden?

Mr. KNUTSON. That is absolutely true. As a matter of fact, the language of a considerable part of Finland, the southern part, as the gentleman knows, is Swedish as well as Finnish.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. Yes.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, I notice the gentleman gives his approval to loans to the Scandinavian countries. Does the gentleman give the same approval to loans to South American countries?

Mr. KNUTSON. We would have to view loans to the South American countries from a different angle.

Mr. GORE. The gentleman means put them on a commercial basis?

Mr. KNUTSON. Strictly so. I would view such loans on a commercial basis, although, as I recall the testimony of Jesse Jones, he stated to the committee as his opinion that Finland would repay any money that we advance. It may be news to the gentleman that Finland has paid to this Government and to private creditors in this country over $90,000,000 since the World War. Had Finland defaulted on her loans the way the other debtor nations did, she would now have a very large dollar credit in this country, which she could use to buy things that she now needs and therefore would not need the credit we now propose to extend.

Mr. GORE. While that is not news, it is very welcome information.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 minutes. There has been so much evidence produced to the effect that this bill in no way guarantees a loan to Finland, that I shall not spend any material time discussing that phase of this proposed legislation. I think the subject has been pretty well covered, and I think it will be covered still better before we finish the debate.

AN ATTEMPT TO PUMP PRIME THE HEMISPHERE

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] brought up two or three points that I wish to discuss briefly. They deal with a situation which has to do with the financing of exports to Latin American countries. Here is an additional chapter in our attempt to pump prime the hemisphere, and here is exactly what I mean by that statement. We have gone along in this country with our pump-priming policy, and if we can believe what the President said to the convention of young people here a few days ago, we come to the conclusion that the unemployment situation is not solved through the Wagner Act or the Wage and Hour Act or pump-priming procedure. This has been primarily due to the fact that the pump priming was not geared to the removal of maladjustments which govern internally in the United States. That is proven by the fact that our people are not investing money in new industries, and by the further fact that our banks are loaded with excess reserves, to such an extent that there has been criticism offered here today against the banks to the effect that they will not lend money.

Now we jump across the water, through the Export-Import Bank, to western Europe, in an attempt to pump prime, and we go to the Latin American countries through the Export-Import Bank in an attempt to pump prime; but at the same time we are proceeding in that manner we are letting the Republic of Mexico thumb its nose in our faces, confiscate private investments of our people in that country, which investments call for more exports from this country than the Export-Import Bank can ever hope to finance. We go into countries further to the South, which have in round figures a billion dollars of default in payments coming to our people. We say to them, "That is perfectly all right. You go ahead and default all you please. You go ahead and confiscate all the private holdings of our citizens in your country which you desire to confiscate and we will extend to your countries loans through the Export-Import Bank."

That is international pump priming.

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

DESTROYS PRIVATE INVESTMENT INCENTIVE

Mr. CRAWFORD. I decline to yield. That is pump priming in a manner which destroys every desire of our people to make private investments in Latin American countries, which, if they did, would be followed by enormous exports of our goods to those countries.

I ask you, what hope is there to our people who hold securities on which default has occurred, who walk the streets without jobs, if they must look to the little trickle of business that comes to our industries through the measly sum which we will afterward give to the Export-Import Bank?

Let us take the testimony of Mr. Jones, which you will find on page 3 of the hearings, in which he says:

> Therefore we are $30,000,000 overcommitted at the present time, and the reason we can be overcommitted is because of repayments and cancelations.

What is he talking about? They had a capital of $100,000,000. They ask here for an increase in that capital of $100,000,000. He is overcommitted to the extent of $30,000,000. At the bottom of page 3 he speaks of a $10,000,000 commitment to Norway. He must add that to the overcommitment of $30,000,000, which gives a total of $40,000,000. He speaks of a $10,000,000 commitment to Sweden. Add that to the $40,000,000 and it gives you $50,000,000. If you take the $20,000,000 which some think Finland is going to get out of this and add it to the $50,000,000, you have $70,000,000 committed. What have you got left? You have got $30,000,000 left, plus the cancelations which might follow, plus payments which might be paid into the revolving fund. What will that $30,000,000, plus these accretions from time to time, amount to in the way of exports? You draw your own conclusions. In my opinion, it is one of the most dangerous policies that we can follow now or at any later time.

An editorial from the Herald Tribune points this out:

> One of the natural repercussions of this American debt policy is to discourage still further the investments of private American capital in Latin America. Would-be investors see that outstanding debts are flouted with impunity and that, in addition to taking no steps to protect American investors, the American Government does nothing effective to protect the legitimate interests of American business concerns from expropriation or confiscation by Latin American governments. The inevitable result is the retardation of business here and abroad.

Let us take up another phase of this situation. Have you heard of the Inter-American Financial and Economic Advisory Committee? If you have not, get a copy of the third draft of the preliminary draft from the Pan American Union and see what the United States is about to be committed to in the way of a $5,000,000 subscription to the stock of that inter-American bank for the purpose of facilitating trade between the United States and Latin American countries. Then take a copy of the bylaws issued under date of February 5, 1940, and look at the powers and look at the involvements. All of that is in the face of these defaults. If I can secure permission to extend the voluminous data in the RECORD, I shall do so, to show some additional information in connection with this.

All of that has to do with our pump priming the Western Hemisphere. This bill moves in that direction. It is not a Finnish loan. If it were I would certainly give it more favorable consideration than I do. As it stands, I am opposed to the bill. I am opposed to this type of operation. I voted against the bill coming out of committee. I do not think we should put it into law at this time. Last year, for instance, the proposition came up. The Export-Import Bank, I believe, asked for $500,000,000. It finally went into a bill in the Senate at $100,000,000. The House later killed that proposition. Now it comes to us in a different form.

Mr. CLEVENGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. CLEVENGER. Would not the gentleman say that this thing is like a good many other of these propositions? By casting a slight Finnish aura around it in the hope of getting one little slice of turkey, we are asked to take several slices of turkey buzzard. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is exactly what this whole program is leading to. Of course it acts as a little cement now and then to finance a little exporting of goods, but keep in mind the Export-Import Bank is not big enough to solve your export problems and thus lead to greatly increased employment.

The chairman of our committee has pointed out that the ratio of exports furnished by the Export-Import Bank as compared to our total exports is almost infinitesimal; it is just a shadow, you might say. Unless you put billions of dollars into the Export-Import Bank it will remain a shadow. Any man who knows anything about figures, and exports, and business knows that.

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. SOUTH. Does not the gentleman also know that Mr. Jones testified that the operations of the bank had shown a profit up to this date?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Talking about profit, Mr. Chairman, with $46,000,000 capital and $2,000,000 surplus, a total of $48,000,000, the bank has been operating since 1934. Here it is, 1940, and we talk about a measly profit of $5,000,000. If we had to depend upon profits of that kind to finance the expenditures of this Government, God only knows what would happen to us. Let us forget or not overemphasize that little profit. It is better than a loss, I must admit. But are we to drive out industry and close the private sources of funds in this country for that little profit? I clipped the following statement out of the Post this morning. Listen to this:

> On February 16 last the Secretary of the Treasury reported to Congress that borrowers from 31 Government corporations and lending agencies had defaulted on $1,053,742,488 in principal and interest payments. Presumably this lost billion has been written off or charged to the taxpayers. Investment banking cannot meet that kind of competition. It must work within the bounds of sound and prudent business principles.

Can private business stand up against that? You try it with your business. Of course, the program interferes with the investment of private funds. Of course, it closes private business. Of course, it discourages people. Of course, it, with great gold imports, builds excess reserves in your member banks. Of course, nobody wants a loan of consequence at the banks for business expansion—and so on the story goes. I repeat that every time you try to pump prime with this kind of shadow boxing you discourage someone in private industry. You had better stop these tactics unless you want the Government to take over all private industry.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. As the gentleman knows, there would probably be a loss if all assets were now realized and the books closed. This may happen in 1941.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The whole profit is so small that I do not like to talk about it. It is like talking about a profit of $50,000 for General Motors, and maybe next year there will be a loss of $92,000,000, as there was in United States Steel one or two years ago—a $92,000,000 loss. They may make money this year, but they may lose much more money next year, as Dr. Lubin, the economist of the Department of Labor, has pointed out.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Certainly.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Does the gentleman from Michigan know any broker or any banker who would tell you that a loan to a country where a state of war exists, whether declared or undeclared, is a sound and good loan?

Mr. CRAWFORD. So far as concerns what is a good loan or what is a bad loan, go to any good banker and try to get the depositors' funds to spend in any way you please. If he is a good banker he will get security. Now, as to what securities are worth when put up by foreign governments in this day of war and defaulting I do not know. But I do not want us to create any more Government lending agencies or add to their capital structures so they can compete with private industry.

The President told us at the beginning of this session that these Government agencies could turn back about $700,000,000 into the Treasury, yet here before we get nicely started into the session is a bill to increase by $100,000,000 the capital of one of them.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. In view of the record of these defaulting foreign countries should we not change the title of this bill to read: "Uncle Sam, the international Santa Claus"? And should we not amend the bill to include a section providing that any American may ship anything he wants to to any foreign country, and send the bill to Mr. Morgenthau, the Secretary of the Treasury, for payment?

Mr. CRAWFORD. The Latin-American countries are smooth enough to know that they can play us for the sucker. We were driven out of Mexico, yet we go right back in there and buy their silver and give them the dollar exchange with which to carry on. See what Bolivia did. [Applause.]

THIRD PRELIMINARY DRAFT OF CONVENTION RELATING TO THE INTER-AMERICAN BANK

The contracting Governments of the American Republics considering

First, that economic and financial cooperation among the American Republics is an essential factor in fostering the welfare of and maintaining solidarity among these Republics:

Second, that such cooperation would be greatly facilitated by the establishment of an Inter-American Bank; have resolved to conclude a convention on the following lines:

The contracting parties agree that the Bank shall be accorded the powers, rights and privileges under their laws to engage in all types of activities, transactions and operations envisaged in such charter and by-laws and further agree to enact any legislation and to take any other action necessary to accord such powers, rights and privileges to the Bank. The United States of America also agrees to grant to the Bank a charter substantially in accordance with the proposed charter annexed hereto. Each contracting party hereby agrees to subscribe for the minimum number of shares required of such government for participation in the Bank as provided in the annexed by-laws.

SECOND ARTICLE

The contracting parties grant within their respective territories, the following rights, privileges, immunities and exemptions, in time of peace or war and in any period of emergency or otherwise; and agree to enact any legislation and to take any other action necessary to effectuate such rights, privileges, immunities and exemptions.

A. The Bank, its assets, obligations to it and its real and personal property of whatsoever nature, including any property deposited with it on a custody basis or otherwise, shall wheresover located and by whomsoever held, be exempt and immune from

(i) requisition, seizure, attachment, execution, confiscation, moratoria and expropriation;

(ii) prohibitions, restrictions, regulations and controls of withdrawal, transfer, or export; and

(iii) currency, monetary, exchange and debt regulation and control:

by the contracting party or any political subdivisions thereof, whether or not compensation is offered; provided, however, that nothing in this paragraph shall prevent a contracting party or political subdivision thereof from attaching or levying execution, subject to any lien or claim of the Bank, upon claims of its nationals against the Bank or upon property held by the Bank for such nationals.

B. Where restrictions, regulations, prohibitions or controls exist or are imposed in the territory of a contracting party in regard to the conversion or exchange of its currency into foreign currencies, the contracting party shall grant, sell or otherwise make available to the Bank, as provided in the next sentence, foreign exchange including precious metals, desired by the Bank for such local currency acquired by the Bank as a result of loans, discounts, extensions of credit, guaranties thereof, or investments, made to or with the guarantee, approval or consent of such contracting party, including principal, interest, and other returns thereon. Such foreign exchange shall be so made available on a basis, as to amount and rate as well as to all other factors, no less favorable than the most favored treatment extended under any circumstances by the contracting party to any government or political subdivision thereof, or to any individual, partnership, association, corporation or other organization or entity of whatsoever nature.

C. The Bank, its assets and real and personal property of whatsoever nature, including, without limitation of the foregoing, its charter, capital, reserves, surplus, income and profits, its activities, transactions and operations, and shares of stock and all notes, debentures, bonds and other such obligations issued by the Bank including dividends and interest thereon, by whomsoever held, and any remunerations or salaries paid by the Bank, and also any individual, partnership, corporation, association or other entity in its dealings and relations with the Bank in any of the foregoing matters and in its acquisitions, holdings, transfers or dispositions of any such shares and obligations of the Bank, shall be exempt and immune from all taxation by a contracting party or a political subdivision thereof now or hereafter imposed and by whatever name described, including, without limitation of the foregoing, excises and imposts; provided, however, that the foregoing shall not be construed as preventing the imposition by a contracting party or any political subdivision thereof of non-discriminatory taxes upon nationals of such contracting party with respect to any of the foregoing. As used in this paragraph "nationals of such contracting party" shall include any person who is domiciled in, or a citizen or resident of, such contracting party; and shall also include any individual, partnership, association, corporation or other entity organized under the laws of such contracting party or political subdivision thereof or having a permanent establishment, such as a branch, office, agency or other fixed place of business, in the territory of such contracting party; but shall not include the Bank. Notwithstanding any of the foregoing, neither a contracting party nor any political subdivision thereof shall impose any tax on or measured by salaries or remunerations paid by the Bank to its officers or employees who are citizens of any other contracting party. Nothing in this paragraph shall make the Bank or any other party referred to above exempt or immune from any customs duties or other taxes, fees, charges or exactions imposed on or in connection with the importation or exportation of any article; provided, however, that the exportation of

(i) coin, currency and of intangible property, including, without limitation of the foregoing, stocks, credit instruments, securities, and evidences of indebtedness, and

(ii) precious metals, other than precious metals produced in the territory of the contracting party and being exported for the first time, owned or held by the Bank, or deposited with it on a custody basis or otherwise, and by whomsoever held, shall be exempt and immune from any customs duties or other taxes, fees, charges, or exactions. The provisions of this paragraph shall not be construed to restrict in any manner any exemption, deduction, credit or other allowance accorded by the laws of any of the contracting parties in the determination of a tax imposed by such party.

D. The Bank, its assets, obligations to it and its real and personal property of whatsoever nature, shall, wheresoever located and by whomsoever held, be subject to attachment or execution by a private party only after final judgment or decree in a suit, action, or proceeding in a court of a contracting party or political subdivision thereof.

E. The stock and the notes, debentures, bonds and other obligations and securities issued by the Bank shall be exempt and immune from prohibitions, restrictions, regulations, or controls now or hereafter imposed by any contracting party or any political subdivision thereof, with respect to the registration, issue and sale of stock, notes, debentures, bonds and other obligations and securities; provided that notes, debentures, bonds and other obligations and securities issued by the Bank shall not be issued or sold by the Bank in the territory of a contracting party which makes a timely objection, as provided in the By-laws of the Bank.

As used in this Article "political subdivision" shall include territories, dependencies, possessions, and also states, departments, provinces, counties, municipalities, districts, and other governmental organizations and authorities.

THIRD ARTICLE

The present convention shall be ratified and effectuated by the contracting parties in conformity with their respective constitutional methods. The original instrument shall be deposited in the Pan American Union, in Washington, which shall transmit authentic certified copies to the contracting parties for the purpose of ratification. The instrument of ratification shall also be deposited in the archives of the Pan American Union, which shall notify the signatory governments of such deposit. This notification shall be considered as an exchange of ratifications.

FOURTH ARTICLE

The present convention shall come into force and effect as between such ratifying parties if and when ratifications of this convention shall have been deposited with the Pan American Union by at least five of the contracting parties which have agreed to subscribe for at least a total of 145 shares of stock of the Bank. Each deposit of ratification shall be accompanied by the designation of a person to serve on the Organizing Committee of the Bank, which Committee shall meet forthwith after the convention shall have come into force and effect as provided herein and proceed with all arrangements necessary for prompt organization of the Bank.

FIFTH ARTICLE

A contracting party shall remain bound under this convention for one year after such party ceases to participate in the Bank and ceases to be in any way obligated to the Bank.

SIXTH ARTICLE

This convention shall remain open to the adherence of American Republics which are not now signatories. The corresponding instruments shall be deposited in the archives of the Pan American Union which shall communicate them to the other contracting parties.

FEBRUARY 6, 1940.

The bank shall also have all incidental powers necessary and proper to carry out the powers now or hereafter expressly authorized herein or in the bylaws of the bank.

SEC. 3. The bank may begin operations when at least a total of 110 shares of stock of the bank are subscribed for by at least five governments which have also deposited their ratifications of the afore-mentioned convention with the Pan American Union.

SEC. 4. The bank shall have succession for a period of 20 years from the date of enactment hereof or until such earlier time as it shall be lawfully dissolved. The United States agrees not to repeal or amend this charter except upon the request of the bank pursuant to a four-fifths majority vote of the board of directors of the bank. FEBRUARY 5, 1940.

DRAFT OF BYLAWS OF A BANK TO BE CALLED THE INTER-AMERICAN BANK

1. LOCATION

The principal office of the bank shall be in the United States of America, and branches may be established anywhere in the Western Hemisphere.

2. CAPITAL STRUCTURE AND PARTICIPATION

A. The capital stock shall be expressed in United States dollars (hereafter referred to as dollars) and shall be authorized in the amount of $100,000,000, consisting of 1,000 shares having a par value of $100,000 each, to be paid for in gold or in dollars. Fifty percent of the issue price of each share shall be paid up at the time of subscription. The balance may be called up at a later date or dates at the discretion of the board of directors of the bank. Two months' notice shall be given of any such calls. Upon the formation of the bank the shares of stock shall be sold at par. Thereafter the issue price of shares shall be fixed by a four-fifths majority vote of the board of directors.

B. Stock shall be available for subscription only to the governments of the American republics which have subscribed or adhered to the convention relating to the bank. For a government to participate in the bank it must subscribe for a minimum number of shares, determined in proportion to the dollar value of the total foreign trade of each of the American republics during the year 1938 as follows:

Group A. Up to $25,000,000: Costa Rica, Ecuador, El Salvador, Haiti, Honduras, Nicaragua, and Paraguay, 5 shares.

Group B. Over $25,000,000 and up to $50,000,000: Dominican Republic, Guatemala, and Panama, 10 shares.

Group C. Over $50,000,000 and up to $75,000,000: Bolivia, 15 shares.

Group D. Over $75,000,000 and up to $100,000,000: Uruguay, 20 shares.

Group E. Over $100,000,000 and up to $150,000,000: Peru, 25 shares.

Group F. Over $150,000,000 and up to $250,000,000: Chile, Colombia, and Cuba, 30 shares.

Group G: Over $250,000,000 and up to $500,000,000: Mexico and Venezuela, 35 shares.

Group H. Over $500,000,000: Argentina, Brazil, and United States, 50 shares.

Each participating country may subscribe for stock in addition to the minimum. Where the demand for such additional stock exceeds the amount available for issue by the bank, such demand will be met on an equal basis from such available shares.

C. Governments of American republics which do not participate in the bank at the time of its formation or which shall have at any time ceased to participate in the bank shall be permitted to participate in the bank upon adhering to the convention relating to the bank, subscribing for the minimum number of shares and complying with any other terms and conditions designated in regulations of the bank.

D. Liability of a shareholder in its shares shall be limited to the issue price of the shares held by it.

E. (1) The shares of stock held by each government shall be security for all the obligations of such government to the bank, and shall not be otherwise pledged or encumbered by the shareholder.

(2) If a government fails to pay any call on a share on the day appointed for the payment thereof, the bank may, after giving reasonable notice to such government, revest in itself title to such share, paying to the defaulting shareholder an amount equal to the fair value of such share as determined by the bank less the amount unpaid on such share and less any amount which the bank considers necessary as additional collateral for any outstanding obligation or liability of such government to the bank. Failure to pay any call on a share on the day appointed for the payment thereof shall deprive the defaulting government of its right to exercise a vote in respect of such share so long as such government remains in default, provided that the failure of a government to pay any call on the minimum number of shares required to be subscribed by it shall deprive such government of the right to exercise any voting power during the period of default.

(3) If a government defaults on any other obligation to the bank, the bank may, after taking reasonable action to realize on any other collateral given to secure such obligation and after giving reasonable notice to such government, revest in itself title to an appropriate number of shares belonging to such government and apply to the defaulted obligation the fair value of such shares as determined by the bank less the amount unpaid on such shares. Any amount remaining, less any amount which the bank considers necessary as additional collateral for any outstanding obligation or liability of such government to the bank, shall be paid by the bank to the defaulting government.

(4) If, after a government has had a reasonable opportunity to present its position to the Board, the Board by a four-fifths majority vote finds that such government has violated any provision of the Convention relating to the bank, such government shall cease to participate in the bank, but its obligations and duties with respect to the bank shall continue and the bank may revest in itself title to an appropriate number of shares belonging to such government and apply the fair value of such shares as determined by the bank, less the amount unpaid on such shares, to compensate the bank for such damages as the bank determines it suffered by reason of such violation. Any amount remaining, less any amount which the bank considers necessary as additional collateral for any outstanding loan or liability of such government to the bank, shall be paid by the bank to such government.

F. Shares of stock may be transferred only to the banks or to other participating governments at a price to be agreed upon between the parties and upon the approval of the transfer by a four-fifths-majority vote of the board of directors. If, as a result of the transfer of shares of stock or reacquisition by the bank, or for any other reason, a government holds less than the minimum amount of shares of stock required of it, such government shall cease to participate in the bank, but its obligations and duties with respect to the bank shall continue.

G. The capital structure of the bank, including he number and par value of shares may be increased or decreased by a four-fifths-majority vote of the board of directors, except that a unanimous vote of the representatives of all the participating governments shall be required to increase or decrease the minimum holdings of participating governments.

H. The voting power of each government on the board of directors shall be distributed as follows: 20 votes for each government for its minimum shares, and 1 vote for each additional share. However, regardless of the amount of stock owned by it, no government shall have a voting power in excess of 50 percent of the total voting power of all the other participating governments on the basis of stock which such other governments own at the time.

3. MANAGEMENT

A. The administration of the bank shall be vested in the board of directors composed of one director and one alternate appointed by each participating government. Each government shall appoint its director and alternate in a manner to be determined by it. Such director shall serve for a period of 2 years. An alternate shall serve for such period as shall be determined by his government. The bank shall pay such reasonable expenses as are incurred by the directors and alternates in attending any meetings of the board or any committee of the bank. The voting power held by a participating government shall be exercised by the director and in his absence by the alternate or a nominee or proxy. The alternate may otherwise participate in the activities of the board.

B. Meetings of the board of directors shall be held not less than four times a year and may be held either at the principal or any branch office or at any other city in a participating country as the board of directors may determine. The president may call special or extraordinary meetings of the board of directors at any time.

C. The board shall select a president of the bank, who will be the chief of the operating staff of the bank and who also shall be ex officio chairman of the board of directors, and one or more vice presidents, who shall be ex officio vice chairmen of the board of directors. The president and vice presidents of the bank shall hold office for 2 years and shall be eligible for reelection.

D. The departmental organization of the bank shall be determined by the board. The heads of departments and other similar officers shall be appointed by the board on the recommendation of the president. The remainder of the staff shall be appointed by the president.

E. The board may also appoint from among its members an executive committee. The board may at any meeting by a four-fifths majority vote, authorize the president or the executive committee or any other committee of the bank to exercise any specified powers of the board; provided, however, that such powers shall be exercised only until the next meeting of the board and shall be exercised in a manner consistent with the general policies and practices of the board. The board may also, by a four-fifths majority vote, delegate to designated officers and committees of the bank, for such periods as it may determine, power to make loans and extend credit in such small amounts as may be fixed by the board.

F. The board may appoint advisory committees chosen wholly or partially from persons not regularly employed by the bank.

G. The board, within a year after its first meeting, shall by regulations prescribe the reserves to be established and maintained against demand deposits and other obligations of the bank and shall prescribe a limitation on the amount of intermediate and long-term assets in relation to capital and surplus; and such regulations shall not be amended, modified, or revoked except by a four-fifths majority vote of the board.

H. Before the bank finally approves an intermediate or long-term loan or extension of credit, a full written report on the merits of the proposed transaction shall be prepared by a committee of experts which may include persons other than officers and employees of the bank.

I. Except as herein otherwise provided, decisions of the board shall be by simple majority of the votes cast. In the case of equality of votes the chairman shall have a deciding vote. A government may vote at meetings either through the director or alternate or through a nominee or proxy in such manner as the board may provide by regulations. When deemed by the president to be in the best interests of the bank, decisions of the board of directors may be made without a meeting by polling the directors on specific questions submitted to them in such manner as the board of directors shall by regulations provide. The board of directors shall by regulations determine what constitutes a quorum for a meeting.

J. Approval by four-fifths majority vote of the board of directors shall be required for the making and granting of intermediate and long-term loans and credits, including the assumption of the obligation of a guarantor on intermediate and long-term loans and credits; the acquisition and sale of intermediate and long-term obligations and securities; the discounting and rediscounting of intermediate and long-term paper; engaging in bullion and foreign-exchange transactions and otherwise incurring foreign-exchange risks; the issuance of debentures and other securities and obligations of the bank; the determination of the functions and duties of the officers and principal employees of the bank and the executive and other committees; the calling up of the balances due on stock; the creation of branches of the bank; and for amending the bylaws, except that article 5A of these bylaws may not be amended and except that the provisions of these bylaws relating to the effect and manner of the making of a timely objection by a participating government may not be amended except by a unanimous vote of the representatives of all the participating governments. Four-fifths majority vote of the board of directors, as used in these bylaws, means four-fifths of the votes cast.

4. ACCOUNTS AND PROFITS

A. The financial year of the bank shall end on December 31.

B. The books and accounts of the bank shall be expressed in terms of the United States dollar.

C. The bank shall publish an annual report and at least once a month a statement of account in such form as the board may prescribe. The board shall cause to be prepared a profit-and-loss account and a balance sheet for each financial year. All published documents shall be printed in the official languages of the participating governments. The board shall designate a committee of directors to arrange for examination, at least once a year, of the books and accounts of the bank by competent experts to be selected by the committee.

D. The yearly net profits of the bank shall be applied as follows:

1. Not less than 25 percent of such net profits shall be paid into surplus until the surplus is equal in amount to the par value of the authorized capital stock of the bank.

2. The remainder of such net profits shall be applied toward the payment of a dividend of not more than 3 percent per annum on the paid-up amount of the stock of the bank; provided, however, that dividends shall be noncumulative and no dividends shall be paid so long as the capital of the bank is impaired.

3. The balance of such profits shall be paid into surplus and be designated a dividend reserve.

E. The board of directors by a four-fifths majority vote may declare dividends out of the dividend reserve in surplus of the bank; provided, however, that total dividends in any one year, including dividends paid pursuant to paragraph D–2 above, shall not be more than 3 percent of the paid-up amount of the stock.

F. The bank may not be liquidated except by a four-fifths majority vote of the board of directors. Upon liquidation of the bank and after discharge of all the liabilities of the bank, the assets remaining shall be divided among the shareholders.

G. The shares shall carry equal rights to participate in the profits of the bank and in any distributions of assets upon liquidation of the bank.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. THORKELSON].

Mr. THORKELSON. Mr. Chairman, this bill, S. 3069, is known throughout the country as the Finnish loan bill, and on its face does not disclose its real purpose.

The minority members of the Committee on Banking and Currency of this House have put their finger on what it really is.

It is a subterfuge to finance Latin America through political loans.

I have in my hand three interesting documents proving this point, which point was raised by the minority when the rule was granted yesterday. The first document is a draft of a convention relating to the Inter-American Bank. A convention is a treaty which need not be confirmed by the Senate, as illustrated by the "300-mile neutrality zone" under the recent Panama convention.

The second document is the charter of the Inter-American Bank, and the third document is a draft of the bylaws which control the "structure, operation, and activities of the bank." On their face the documents show that they were issued by the Pan American Union, of Washington, D. C., and apparently prepared by the Inter-American Finance and Economic Advisory Committee, made up of bureaucrats in the Treasury, State, and Commerce Departments.

The idea of this bank was proposed last fall by the Mexican delegate to the Costa Rica financial congress.

Under this program, as revealed by these three clever documents, the President of these United States signs the convention which becomes a treaty binding upon this Congress.

Therefore this Congress is bound to grant the bank charter provided in the convention.

This is international finance with a "cold deck." When these three Latin American countries have confiscated American property, destroyed established American businesses, embracing the doctrines of Lenin and Marx by "sharing the wealth" with force, then it is communism or the communal ownership of private property in its most precise form.

This bill now under consideration is clearly a step in the program that I set before you, which has destroyed, is destroying, and will continue to destroy, American foreign trade.

The New York Herald Tribune, on June 5, 1939, in an editorial entitled "Pump Priming a Hemisphere," points out that Chili has just announced that it will take over American oil distribution in that country and would like to place an $80,000,000 loan in the United States through the Import-Export Bank covered by this bill. Although pump priming has failed at home, this Congress is risking the drying up of further markets for American capital and enterprise. It points out that most Latin American countries are already heavily in debt, and nearly all of them, with the exception of Argentina, have been in default for years. By this bill Congress seeks to ignore these defaults and is directing the management of the Import-Export Bank and the Federal Loan Administrator to grant further credits to the Government and businessmen of Latin America, without any assurance, as the Latin-American record of defaults and expropriations proves that the Import-Export Bank will ever see the American taxpayers' hard-earned tax payments returned to us.

If these credit risks in Latin America are so desirable and so advantageous, so profitable, and so secure, I put it to you that private banking would gladly embrace this wonderful opportunity before the Inter-American Finance and Economic Advisory Committee of the State, Treasury, and Commerce Departments ever got underway; before this Congress in its cautious legislation ever had a chance to consider this bill; and before the Government bank in Washington or the Latin American pipe line got a chance to advance the American taxpayers' moneys to the governments and businessmen of Latin America.

It points out that the American Government does nothing effective to protect the legitimate interests of American business concerns from expropriations or confiscations by Latin American governments. It shows that the administration has done nothing to protect American interests against illegal and unfair acts of some of the governments of these countries. Bolivia, Mexico, and now Chile—their technique is different but their objective is the same, namely to take over well-running organizations after Americans have done the pioneering and development.

The New York Journal of Commerce, in an editorial of July 11, 1939, shows that—

> Efforts to prime the pump of American foreign trade through Export-Import Bank loans are doomed to failure. Whatever benefits are derived from such loans are more than offset by a failure to create conditions that promote new private investments abroad. As long as this continues to be the case, Congress is justified in keeping the activities of the Export-Import Bank within modest limits.

The Wall Street Journal recently pointed out in an editorial that—

> It is inconceivable that our Government should make loans or commerce credits available here to governments which have refused to respect the legitimate rights of foreign investors, or to the citizens of such governments—desirable as it is that we cultivate commercial relations with the countries to the south of us on a basis of fairly balanced mutual advantage, the question of good faith comes first. Somewhat unfortunately there is no easy way of determining just how far the doctrine of confiscation may have spread south of the Rio Grande. In view of that difficulty it is necessary to say that our Government credit agencies had better confine their activities to countries the governments of which clearly dissociate themselves from that doctrine.

This Congress must be aware that the views which the press express are known to their readers throughout the country. There comes a time, gentlemen, there comes a time.

The Calumet (Mich.) News, in an editorial dated June 16, 1939, entitled "Dreams That Become Nightmares," points out that governments owe the United States more than $12,000,000,000; that Mexico postponed payment on confiscated farm lands for decades, and justified her position as "expropriation of a general and impersonal character" affecting her own nationals and foreigners alike; that obviously if a gang of Americans in the United States should seize all the oil properties in Oklahoma, Texas, or California, they would be held responsible for daily crimes. The editorial out West goes on to conclude that:

In the meantime, while Mexico ducks and evades settlement of this vital issue, the daily confiscations go on to the tune of over $100,000 a day—a loss to foreign property holders which the Mexican Government never can make up. * * * But in spite of this apparently easy way of getting something for nothing, the Mexican confiscation program is not working out the way it was planned, and already the properties are deteriorating. Laborers, commerce, and industry have not received the promised profits or spiritual uplift. There has been no increase in employment or wages. Living conditions have not improved. In fact, government management has been decidedly unsuccessful. The dream of the National Revolutionary Party headed by President Cardenas has turned into a nightmare.

The Mexican peso has dropped from 2 to 1 to the dollar to 5 to 1, and is well on its way to 10 to 1, which raises the cost of living of every Mexican citizen, and the elections in Mexico are in October.

The New York Herald Tribune last October carried an editorial on the subject which we are considering under this bill, and points out that—

In the first place, not all the countries of Latin America need stabilization loans, whereas all except Argentina want capital; that while it is obviously desirable to enlarge the trade between the United States and Latin America this must be, in the final analysis, on a basis of exchange rather than of loans.

The editorial says that Mr. Jesse Jones—to whom we are contemplating the wisdom of giving $100,000,000 under this bill—put it well in his letter to the National Foreign Trade Council last week when he said that—

While credit can help, the only permanent solution is real trade, where we buy as well as sell—somewhat as our seafaring ancestors used to do when the ship captain was the trader.

The editorial points out that the trouble is to find things to buy in Latin America that we can use. Until we find such articles, it is folly to advance large sums to finance selling to Latin America. This becomes a form of international pump priming, with all present signs indicating that it will not work.

As a matter of fact, when the broad picture of the relations between the United States and Latin America is considered, it is impossible to leave out the record of defaults on loans made by Americans to Latin American countries and the effect of direct investments in stimulating trade. The idea that loans create trade is open to grave question.

We had our post-war loans which have never been repaid. The foreigners got the goods, which created a false period of prosperity in the gay 1920's and we have had a headache ever since.

As the editorial says, for a brief period loans give the illusion of increased trade. But as a rule, a loan is little more than "a shot in the arm."

Direct investments, on the other hand, especially those in productive properties, tend to maintain and slowly increase the volume of trade between the investing nation and the country where the money is invested. While this generalization is subject to certain qualifications, its pertinence is exhibited by the fact that one of the proposals being considered in Washington calls for an increase in direct investments in Latin America.

The editorial concludes with a statement that the good-neighbor policy must, in the final analysis, rest on economic realities. It may be diplomacy, but out West we would call it the double-cross for the State Department to try to set up this inter-American bank under these circumstances, and yet, at the same time, attempt to convey to Latin American governments the absolute and unlimited conviction of this Congress that no neighbor is a good neighbor who attempts by trick, subterfuge, or indirection to achieve communization of American property abroad. [Applause.]

SESSION ON INVESTMENTS AND NATIONAL POLICY OF THE UNITED STATES IN LATIN AMERICA [1]

(By Max Winkler, College of the City of New York)

Latin America appeared a logical field for the placement of American capital. Half a century ago our total stake in the countries south of the Rio Grande barely exceeded $50,000,000. At the outbreak of the European war our investments in Latin America had reached $1,300,000,000, or almost four times as much as our European investments, which were estimated at $350,000,000. At the beginning of the current year American investments in Latin America totaled $5,705,601,000, or slightly in excess of our stake in Europe. * * *

Few probably realize that for every increase of $1,000 in our investments in Latin America during the past decade and a half our commerce with our neighbors increased $140.49, while our trade with Europe during the period 1913–30 registered a gain of only $72.67 for every $1,000 increase in American investments in the old continent.

These figures would seem to demonstrate the underlying causes for America's economic penetration of her southern neighbors. It is obvious that we did not make our investments largely in order to make it possible for our soldiers, our bankers, and oil barons to rule Latin America, as stated by a rather prominent American historian versed in Central and South American affairs.

Although both interest and expedience dictate that Latin America should rank first as an investment field for America's surplus funds, extreme discrimination must be exercised in the granting of credits, and precise stipulations made regarding the purpose to which they shall be put. Lenders who ignore or do not heed sufficiently these cardinal principles are conferring no benefits upon the borrowers. On the contrary, they are definitely aggravating their difficulties without securing for themselves corresponding compensation, except perhaps the transitory joy which resides in monetary rewards.

Our experience as a lending power, brief though it is, is replete with instances which clearly demonstrate that many a credit, granted regardless of the manner in which the proceeds were expended, turned into a discredit to ourselves, without in any way benefiting the borrower, except perhaps some unscrupulous public official. * * *

During and after the war our friends south of the Rio Grande discovered that the Norte Americano was no longer a myth. He consumed large quantities of coffee and sugar and bananas, of tin and nitrate and manganese. He supplied ingenious farming devices and cheap automobiles which did as good service as expensive cars from Europe. But he was not popular because his ways differed from all precedents, and he was suspected of contempt for those whom he arrogantly termed "Latin Americans."

Then was born a wonderful new era—an era in which millions of dollars—tens and hundreds of millions—were offered to the governments and industries of the southern republics by the same incomprehensible Norte Americano, who not so many years back would bicker over 90 days' credit on a hundred dollars' worth of merchandise. In typical American fashion, we aimed at achieving overnight what it has taken our European friends decades to accomplish. It seemed as if we had set as our goal the creation of a record as regards the investment of capital in South and Central America. The desirability of such investments was rarely questioned, the principal object, on many occasions, being the extent of the underwriters' profit. * * *

So long as the golden stream was flowing in, respect and gratitude filled the hearts of Argentinians and Brazilians, Chileans and Peruvians, Bolivians and Colombians and Uruguayans for the manifestation of good will and confidence on the part of the United States. Thousands of young men from those countries came here to learn our language and commercial methods. Our engineers and business experts journeyed south by invitation. Presidents of the United States exchanged visits with the Presidents of those republics. Good relations and mutual confidence became firmly established.

America's leadership in the field of international finance was undisputed. Americanization and American methods were the goal of every nation across the Atlantic and south of the Rio Grande. The United States abounded in experts in practically every field of endeavor and at all times ready to lend those American wizards of economics and finance to whomever was anxious to borrow them. Of course, each time an expert was dispatched to a foreign land the American investing public began to be prepared for a loan to that country. The expert's advice was invariably followed or accompanied by the flotation of issues on behalf of the nations whom he had been called upon to advise. * * *

Then, suddenly and without warning, the fountain of credit dried up. The New York foreign-bond market, expensively organized through years of educational campaigns, collapsed. Underwriting houses, investment corporations, and foreign-bond brokers abandoned their bond departments in order to devote all of their time to a stock-market orgy which lasted 17 months.

Latin America was bewildered by this changed situation, which New York bankers were finding difficult to explain. Relations were still good, but there was an undercurrent of resentment, particularly on the part of governments with unfinished roads and public works for which funds were actually promised, subject to market conditions. It cannot be said that there is good understanding when one of the parties does not understand.

Unemployment set in. Demand for native products decreased. Governments were found wanting because they could no longer keep promises. Discontent grew, and so did the desire to change conditions through revolutions—a method which, on the whole, had lain dormant for decades. It was discovered, however, that a mere change in government cannot alter appreciably the price of copper and tin, of silver and nitrate, of coffee and sugar. The governmental treasuries were empty; trade was falling; reserve ratios dwindled; and the inevitable happened—suspension of payment on contractual obligations.

[1] Papers and Proceedings of the Forty-fourth Annual Meeting of the American Economic Association. The American Economic Review, vol. 22, Supplement, March 1932.

The age-old theory was revised: South and Central American countries have little, if any, regard for the rights and privileges of creditors. Nothing can be further from the truth. Integrity and honesty are not the sole property of certain nations. Our southern neighbors are inherently as honest as our Anglo-Saxon cousins or our far-eastern friends. The fault is at least as much the lender's as it is the borrower's.

To begin with, we almost went out of our way to finance Latin-American projects. No loan was turned down so long as we felt that it would be absorbed by the American investing public. It is indeed amazing to find that, in spite of the unparalleled demand for foreign issues during the period 1924–29, not a single loan was sold to the American public on behalf of a nonexistent foreign government. Anyone familiar with the state of the bond market at that time knows how easy it would have been to place successfully even bonds of such category.

The result was that nations were permitted to accumulate a debt far beyond their capacity to meet. Many of our bankers, relatively new in the field, had cultivated a peculiar idea about Latin America. They were inclined to look upon financial transactions with most of our neighbors as hazardous, and consequently decided to have the supposed risk offset by the onerous terms imposed. In this connection it may be of interest to quote from a statement made by one of South America's most distinguished statesmen, Dr. Augustin Edwards, of Santiago, anent the sale to an American group of a Bolivian loan. "Loans," he said, "are made to countries in which the financial and economic condition and the governments offer reasonable guarantee of repayment. Capitalists are not obliged to extend credit to those who do not offer such guarantees. But beyond this it is not safe to go." American bankers did go beyond this, and it has proved distinctly unsafe, not so much for them as for those of the American investing public who had been prevailed upon to purchase those bonds.

The default on the part of South American republics, regardless of who may be responsible, has doubtless dealt a severe blow to the credit standing of these countries in the financial markets of the world. Fear on the part of investors, due largely to paucity of information, that the countries which have not as yet defaulted might emulate their neighbors has aggravated an already complicated problem. It is for these and similar reasons that we often encounter the most unusual spectacle of seeing South American issues, the service on which continues to be met, sell at prices which are not appreciably above the coupons which they bear. We witness third-lien bonds selling substantially in excess of first-lien issues, and bonds with higher interest rates selling considerably below issues with lower rates.

Such is the irretrievable penalty a nation is obliged to pay for the collapse of its credit. And since credit is one of the underlying factors in a nation's commerce, the trade of the country in question with its neighbors also suffers considerably.

Even in 1930, which was admittedly one of the most trying years in the economic history of Latin America, our total commerce with our southern neighbors showed a gain over the 1913 figures of more than 73 percent and compares with a gain in our own total trade over the pre-war figure of about 63.5 percent.

Careful and unprejudiced analysis of our relations with our southern neighbors reveals that the United States banker was not always extending aid for purely selfish reasons, or because he was anxious to further an imperialistic scheme evolved to subjugate all of Latin America. * * *

Within the past 50 years, our trade with Latin America has increased almost seven times; whereas our trade with Europe has, in the same period, advanced less than three and one-half times. Moreover, our commerce with Latin America has shown an even more impressive growth than the total trade of the United States, which increased slightly more than six times during the period 1880–1930.

Many are the disappointments to which our bankers for, and investors in, Latin American countries have been subjected, and even more numerous are the disappointments of American holders of Latin-American bonds. But large, too, is the number of mistakes which have characterized in the past our foreign-loan policy in general, and our Latin-American loan policy in particular, and for which the irretrievable penalty is now being exacted in the form of defaults and suspensions of payment.

Nevertheless, the importance of Latin America to the United States as a future market for our manufactured goods, cannot be disputed. Why do we not, therefore, concentrate our efforts to the end that our commerce with Latin America, amounting to $1,600,000,000 yearly, be at least maintained, and that it be not lost to us at a time when we most need it?

With approximately $6,000,000,000 of American capital invested in Latin-American securities and enterprises, it is no longer a question whether such investments should or should not have been made. Such question is by $6,000,000,000 too late. We are in Latin America to that extent, and it is incumbent upon us, or those of us who are charged with the guidance of the economic policies of the American people, to see to it that adequate protection is given to what has already been staked in Latin America, and that proper care is exercised in whatever investments we may make in the future.

This could best be accomplished through an unbiased and impartial agency, whose activities would be directed by men of experience in international affairs and of sufficiently high standing to command the respect of the community. And, while it is true that such an agency might from time to time find itself opposed to interests anxious to finance Latin American or foreign projects in general, largely because of the profits accruing from such undertaking, it could to advantage adopt as its slogan the Latin words: "Let them dislike us, as long as they respect us."

[1] The estimates of American investments in Latin America have been prepared by the writer.

The reasons for the discrepancy between these figures and those presented by the Department of Commerce are presented in a special study on "A New Estimate of American Investments Abroad," prepared by the Department. These reasons include, among others, the elimination by the Department of American investments in the obligations of the Mexican Government, its various political subdivisions, as well as in Mexican railways, advancing as a reason for the elimination the prevailing low quotation of Mexican securities and the resultant difficulty to determine their true value.

It is obviously difficult to subscribe unqualifiedly to such arguments. After all, the investment of American capital cannot be determined on the basis of the liquidating value at the time the computation is made, but must be based upon the actual amount invested in any given situation. If market values are chosen, it will become necessary to revise American capital investments abroad every time the quotation of the various foreign securities held in this country will undergo changes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VAN ZANDT] as he may desire.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, for many years I have been a stanch advocate for a neutrality policy that will keep our country from becoming involved in another World War.

During the first and second sessions of this Congress there was much discussion concerning neutrality. Those of you who supported the administration's neutrality measure assured the membership of this House that such legislation was an iron-bound and foolproof neutrality policy. Those of us who voted against repeal of the arms embargo cast aside our opposition to the administration's neutrality policy when the majority adopted it, joining in the pious wish that such a policy would keep America out of war.

Since the enactment of the administration's neutrality policy much water has flowed over the dam. Russia's invasion of Finland has aroused the sympathy of the American people. Some say this sympathy demands military aid for Finland in her valiant battle of resistance against the Russian bear.

I challenge the interpretation to be placed on this word "sympathy." True enough fully 98 percent of the American people are sympathetic to the Finns, provided our feelings are translated purely in the light of giving nonmilitary aid to this stricken country.

Every Member of this House has a definite mandate from the American people to keep this Nation out of war. As a Member of this body, I take this opportunity to call to your attention that while our sympathies are definitely with the Finnish people in their distress yet we cannot permit our sympathies to lead us in the direction that will ignore the mandate of the American people by setting a precedent that will surely plunge us into war.

We have before us for consideration S. 3069—a bill that provides for increasing the lending authority of the Export-Import Bank of Washington and for other purposes. This bill has been labeled by the spokesmen of the administration as a measure to aid Finland. Yet at no place in the bill is Finland mentioned. Even the committee report of the House Committee on Banking and Currency which accompanies this bill discloses that the Export-Import Bank may make a loan to Finland, but no definite commitment is made nor guaranty given that Finland will receive any assistance.

When Jesse H. Jones, Administrator of the Federal Loan Agency, under whose jurisdiction the Export-Import Bank functions, testified before the House Committee on Banking and Currency, he was courageous enough to confess the fact that no part of the $100,000,000 to be authorized under S. 3069 was committed to Finland. In other words, Administrator Jones was asking for $100,000,000 for the Export-Import Bank regardless of what has taken place in Finland. This is proved by quoting Administrator Jones while before the House Committee on Banking and Currency. I quote from page 35 of the hearings before the House Banking and Currency Committee:

Mr. GIFFORD of Massachusetts. And somebody is trying to take advantage of it (Finland) by using the Finland situation to get $100,000,000.

Mr. JONES. There is no reason for Finland to be mentioned in this bill at all. This is the same bill we came up here with last year.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Delaware. In other words, you need the $100,000,000 regardless of what has taken place in Finland.

Mr. JONES. Yes.

A little further in the hearings Mr. Jones makes a similar statement as recorded on page 35 of the hearings.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. If the $100,000,000 is authorized Finland will get about $10,000,000. Is that correct?

Mr. JONES. Finland may get $20,000,000 or $10,000,000 or maybe $12,000,000 or $15,000,000. I want to make it plain I am not able to make a definite answer about that.

And on page 36 of the hearings I quote Mr. Jones again.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. But we have to authorize $100,000,000 before you can make a $10,000,000 loan to Finland.

Mr. JONES. Well, I do not know about that definitely.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Did not I understand you to tell me yesterday that in order to make a $10,000,000 loan we would have to authorize $100,000,000?

Mr. JONES. I do not think the bill ought to be based on that assumption. I think if you do not want to pass this bill for general purposes, it should not be passed.

Anyone reading the above testimony will agree that someone is deliberately camouflaging the real issue here today at the expense of Finland. As previously stated, at nowhere in the bill is Finland mentioned. Mr. Jones, when appearing before the committee, and in his own words, states that no commitment of any of the sum of $100,000,000 has been made to Finland. Furthermore, by frequent use of the words "may" and "if" he refuses to even make a promise that a portion of this money will go to Finland.

Let us tear the mask from this bill, S. 3069, which has been erroneously labeled as the Finnish loan bill. As Mr. Jones has said, this bill is nothing more than a request for a New Deal agency to grab an additional $100,000,000 of the American taxpayers' money and disburse same at their own pleasure under the guise of aiding war-torn Finland.

My heart goes out to the stricken Finnish people, who are deserving of a humanitarian loan to aid them in their plight. This bill, however, is not providing definite aid to Finland but is merely a means by which the New Deal can snatch an additional $100,000,000 of the taxpayers' money while crying, "Let's aid Finland."

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

HE SEEKS OTHER WORLDS TO CONQUER

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, convinced by the flattery of those whom he has raised to high positions and by his own self-esteem that he is the only individual in our 140,000,000 population competent to direct the destinies of our Nation, Franklin Roosevelt is now engaged, through the use of Federal funds and Federal patronage, in an effort to reelect himself President of the United States.

As the lifelong patriotic Democratic Senator from Virginia, CARTER GLASS, stated on the floor of the Senate on June 24, 1937:

The last election (meaning the election of 1936) was carried by people who were getting favors from the Government, people who were subsidized by the Government, people who were on relief rolls, and people who were sanctioning the invasion of private property and its occupation, as is being done now.

The consuming fires of his ambition have overcome any reluctance which the President might have had to accept the aid of the Communists, a party whose objective is the overthrow of our Government by force. President Roosevelt himself and his henchman, Murphy, received in their political campaigns, without protest, the aid of Earl Browder, head of the Communist Party. The President and Murphy broke with Browder and the Communists, on the surface at least, but they did this only after the activities of the Communists had been exposed by the Dies committee and the prosecution of Browder for criminal acts could no longer be delayed.

Today the President is using his great office to secure delegates who, in the Democratic National Convention, will do his bidding. It is not denied that he seeks to dominate that convention, to take the nomination for President for himself or to name his successor—all this on the theory that he, and he alone, can successfully perform the duties of a Chief Executive.

No man in the history of our country has done more to curtail the powers of Congress; to take over the legislative functions granted it under the Constitution. No man in the history of our country has so attempted to influence the judicial branch of our Government as has Roosevelt. He has followed the course of Hitler and has attempted, by usurping the functions of Congress and of the courts, to utterly change our form of government; to concentrate all power in the hands of the Executive—in his own hands.

He revealed his purpose when he said of his first administration that, in it, those who insisted upon government under the Constitution had met their match and that he hoped that of his second administration he could say that they had met their master.

He acknowledged that he stood in a position to destroy the liberty of our people when he stated:

In 34 months we have built up new instruments of public power. In the hands of a people's government this power is wholesome and proper. But in the hands of political puppets of an economic autocracy such power would provide shackles for the liberties of the people.

Of course, he wanted us all to understand that his motives and his desires were beyond question; that the arbitrary powers of a dictator placed in his hands would in no way destroy our liberty.

Time and time again he has told the people of this Nation that all those who opposed him were greedy, were selfish, without charity or kindliness, and lacked patriotism. He hails himself, and his followers hail him, as infallible. He has set himself, if not upon a throne, at least upon a pedestal, at which all should look not only with admiration but with the eyes of an idolater.

History teaches us that all dictators have attained their power by leading those who eventually became their subjects to believe that the program adopted and followed was a benign one; one in the interests of humanity; one whose only object was for good.

First in the name of the forgotten man; then for the purpose of serving humanity; now under the guise of an effort to establish world peace, Roosevelt has carried on his drive for absolute power.

Already one of his satellites has publicly declared that Roosevelt, the man, is the "symbol" of our democracy. For 150 years the Constitution has been our guide; our courts, our executive officers, our Congress, have been the symbols through which the Constitution was made a thing of life.

Even a Roosevelt must die; or are we, when the reign of this one is ended, to have so far yielded our independence that we shall accept with servility a "Jimmie"?

With 7 years of his administration behind him, facts—cold, indisputable facts—bring the realization that President Roosevelt has time and again violated his most solemn promises; the promises on which he secured his election to the office he holds. The record shows that he has not kept faith with the American people.

Although he told us, when a candidate for office, that the then depression was the problem of that day and that we must not borrow to meet it—that such a course would inevitably bring ruin and bankruptcy to us as a nation—he has for 7 years, without fail, created deficits, continued to borrow, and has without variation followed the course which he himself declared would wreck our Nation as a nation.

Not only has he brought us to the verge of financial ruin—and this in violation of every promise which he made—but he has created agencies and appointed to office men who have deliberately followed a course which has deprived a large group of our citizens of their rights under the Constitution.

I need cite but one law, one agency, to prove my point. The National Labor Relations Act, while purporting to give to workingmen the right to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, was so drawn, and has been so interpreted and administered, that the highest Court of this land—the Supreme Court of the United States—has solemnly declared that under it employees may be deprived of the right to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing.

Under that act, as administered by the Board, men have been deprived of the right of free speech; and it yet remains to be seen whether the Supreme Court, a majority of whom now owe their appointment to the President, will sanction this violation of the Federal Constitution.

The disclosures before the Smith committee investigating the National Labor Relations Board and the operation of the National Labor Relations Act show that employers hailed before that Board have been denied the right to be confronted by the witnesses who gave evidence against them. They have been denied the right of cross-examination. They have been deprived of the opportunity to present witnesses in their own defense and cases in which they were involved have been decided by biased and prejudiced officials.

The objective of the Communists is the overthrow of this Government by force. As long ago as 1934, Bainbridge Colby, Wilson's Secretary of State, made the declaration that:

> It is openly charged, and indeed admitted, that a substantial number of the President's immediate advisers are not desirous of business revival, feeling that to prolong the depression will produce a better psychological background for the prosecution of their revolutionary designs. The overturn of our institutions, including the Constitution, is their avowed goal.

Earl Browder said:

> We industrial unionists are going to take over the factories some day for three very good reasons:
> 1. Because we need them.
> 2. Because we want them.
> 3. Because we have the power to get them.

Browder's drive, through his Communists in the C. I. O., to take over the industries of this country, was successful to a marked degree in the sit-down strikes beginning in Michigan in 1937. Browder's campaign has been carried on with not a little success by the President's friend and confidant, John L. Lewis, who was instrumental in making contributions to a fund for the President's election which totaled more than $1,700,000.

The charge of Colby has, by subsequent events, been shown to be true, and one who now views and weighs the facts can clearly see that the President has, by peaceful means, gone a long way in his campaign to overthrow our constitutional form of government.

Confronted by the failure of his domestic policies, fearful that the expenditure of millions—yes, billions—of dollars of Federal money will not purchase for him a renomination and an election, the President now seeks to involve himself in foreign affairs. Even new dealers are now complaining that, for the time being, the President has—we might say momentarily—ceased to aid them in their plan for "making America over" and is now looking for other worlds to conquer.

He has seen a Mussolini in Italy, a Hitler in Germany, and a Stalin in Russia all march forward to the spotlight, to the front of the stage of world affairs. Apparently consumed with envy and jealousy, not content to remain at home and exercise the arbitrary power which he has seized and which has been used to destroy the liberty of our citizens, he now seeks to range himself alongside the world's dictators, and, perchance, become the chief of the four. He has sent his envoy across the seas in the opening drive for a place in the tragedy now being played by those abroad who have successfully destroyed democracy in their respective countries.

While talking peace, expressing a desire to keep this country out of war, President Roosevelt has been guilty of provocative acts, the natural result of which would lead us into war. A failure at home, with a record which shows that he has no solution for our domestic problems, no regard for his promises, no concern for the future welfare of our children, he is now seeking to distract our attention from our homeland, to become entangled in foreign affairs, and to place himself in a position where, at our Nation's expense, he can be hailed as the peacemaker of the world.

It is time that Americans who love their country, who have faith in our form of government, as asked by Lincoln at Gettysburg, again dedicate themselves to the preservation of our liberties.

The thought which I have attempted to express you will find in an article by Arthur Sears Henning in the Chicago Tribune of February 26, and which is made a part hereof. That article reads as follows:

PRESIDENT SETS CAP FOR ROLE OF PEACE ARBITER—EYES THIRD TERM AS MEANS TO END

(By Arthur Sears Henning)

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 25.—President Roosevelt, it was learned today, has bared to several Democratic officials the ambition to become the pacificator of Europe and Asia either as President of the United States or as the appointee of his successor to represent America in the peace conference that will end the war.

Also, it was indicated to his confidants that if he should realize that ambition, and if there should evolve from the peace conference that widely discussed federation of the powers, Mr. Roosevelt would consider himself the logical choice for first president of the world.

These ambitions are now engrossing the interest and energies of the President to the subordination of the Presidential attention to domestic problems, according to leading new dealers, who are complaining that Mr. Roosevelt has abandoned their great program for "making America over."

THIRD TERM OR CONTROL

To attain these objectives it is essential that Mr. Roosevelt either get himself elected to a third term or get a successor elected who would appoint him chairman of the American delegation to the peace conference.

That his preference is to get a third term for himself is little doubted in official Washington, particularly in view of the encouragement given Democratic leaders by Mr. Roosevelt to enter his name in the Presidential primaries in numerous States.

Most significant is regarded the failure of the President to withdraw his name from the Illinois primary before the withdrawal dead line last night. No less significant is regarded the character of the President's evasiveness on the subject, particularly his statement that he knew nothing about the filing of his name in Illinois, accounts of which have filled the newspapers.

CONVERSATIONS BARE PLANS

The President's plans and ambitions have been divulged in conversations with Democratic officials and in several letters which are destined in due time to take their place in the historic record.

According to these accounts, Mr. Roosevelt sees himself as the dominant figure at the peace conference molding the peace structure of the world as did Prince Metternich at the Congress of Vienna after the downfall of Napoleon. In at least one conversation he mentioned Metternich as the statesman whose diplomacy he felt himself capable of equaling, nay, surpassing.

It was Metternich who went down in history as the chief architect of the balance of power established at Vienna that kept the peace of Europe for a hundred years. Mr. Roosevelt thinks he could devise a permanent peace.

DETERMINED TO HAVE HAND

On more than one occasion the President has said that he is determined to have a hand in the settlement of the European war. And his project is not confined to the continent of Europe. He believes that the pacification of Asia can be accomplished at the same time.

His confidants gathered from his remarks that Mr. Roosevelt conceives it to be his mission to employ the power of the United States to obstruct the subjugation of China by Japan until the European war shall end and Great Britain and France shall be free to come to the aid of China.

Then, as the President conceives it, the peace conference would be broadened to embrace the Asiatic war and Mr. Roosevelt, invoking the arts of Metternich, would manipulate a settlement forcing Japan to evacuate China.

RECALLS WILSON'S MISTAKES

In these conversations the President indicated his determination to avoid the mistakes of President Wilson in the negotiation of the Versailles Peace Treaty, which the United States Senate failed to ratify. Mr. Roosevelt would not make Mr. Wilson's mistake of excluding Senators from the peace delegation. He would include even Republican Senators.

Mr. Wilson's mistake of going to Europe himself while President as head of the American delegation also has been pondered by Mr. Roosevelt, who suggested that this difficulty might be obviated by electing Secretary of State Cordell Hull to the Presidency and by Mr. Hull's appointment of Mr. Roosevelt to head the American peace mission.

POINTS TO WELLES TOUR

To the officials who have received these confidences from the President there is nothing mysterious in his current moves in relation to the Presidential election and to peace in Europe. His dispatch of Under Secretary of State Sumner Welles to Europe to sound the powers on peace, his appointment of Myron Taylor to collaborate with Pope Pius on peace possibilities, and his initiation of conversations with neutral nations on the character of the peace are regarded as maneuvers to exploit Mr. Roosevelt as the logical world pacificator.

The inference then would be that it would be advisable for the United States to retain him at the helm or a person of his choice for the Presidency during the next 4 years.

NEUTRALS BARRED LAST TIME

Unless the United States enters the war Mr. Roosevelt cannot be assured of a hand in the peace. Neutrals did not take part in the Paris or any other peace conference. Europeans who blame Woodrow Wilson's visionary panaceas for the current war are voicing demands that America be kept out of the next war settlement.

Mr. Roosevelt, however, has set out to organize the neutrals to demand a voice in the peace. If that demand becomes sufficiently insistent, Mr. Roosevelt can look forward to a place at the peace conference, provided he or a President of his choice occupies the White House at the time.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. PITTENGER].

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of aid for Finland, either by way of a loan or the supplying of materials, or whatever is necessary to help a republic that is fighting our battle—the battle of civilization against communism.

I think that the golden opportunity of the Republic of the United States to help the Republic of Finland is here. It was here, in fact, last October, when the brutal Russian hordes were on the boundary line of Finland. Now is the time to extend aid and not split hairs about it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ALEXANDER]?

There was no objection.

FOREIGN LOANS

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, the proposition before us to increase the lending authority of the Export-Import Bank of Washington from $100,000,000 to $200,000,000 is, we must all realize, a complex and, therefore, a controversial matter. Having to do as it does with an increase of our loans among others, to not only China but also to Finland, both of which countries are in the throes of war as the result of an aggressive attack by military dictatorships, it is therefore necessary that we give the matter more than casual consideration. These two countries are probably the best friends we have among all the nations of the world, and for that reason, the heart and sympathy of America is with them in their hour of trouble.

To show the overwhelming sentiment in my section for the policy of extending the aid proposed in this bill for the Republic of Finland, I have added below the names and messages from many individuals, and from numerous organizations having several thousand members; all showing their favorable sentiment. I have also added at the bottom of the list messages from two groups, and three individuals, who are all the ones that have written me opposing the extension of aid to Finland.

Here are those who favor aid:

Hon. JOHN G. ALEXANDER,
Washington, D. C.:

By the action of the Sons of Norway Lodge of Bayport, Minn., we urge you to vote for the loan to Finland. We trust you to do all in your power to put this through.

Respectfully yours,

GEO. RAMSTAD, President.
PEDER EBRE, Secretary.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.

Freya Lodge No. 1, Daughters of Norway, with its 218 members, hereby earnestly appeal to you, to support the bill before Congress, extending loan to Finland.

Respectfully yours,

FREYA LODGE NO. 1, DAUGHTERS OF NORWAY,
By Mrs. T. A. SWAN, President.
Mrs. T. MOSLET, Secretary.

Vote in favor of a loan to Finland to be used as they see fit—for the purchase of munitions as well as foodstuffs.

G. S. WALL, Minneapolis.

Do everything in your power to make possible a loan to Finland.

M. A. DIXON.
F. JOHNSON.

This letter came from the following:

Hon. JOHN G. ALEXANDER.

DEAR SIR: Please support the issue for a loan to Finland.

Rev. R. H. Huffman, C. A. Betteridge, Karl H. Gustafson, A. W. Cameron, John J. Schuster, Catherine Mullen, Harley A. Miller, C. D. Tilton, A. S. Anderson.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.

I sincerely hope you will find it entirely consistent to support the loan to Finland, who has fulfilled their obligation in every respect and now needs the full support, both morally and financially, of all Christian people.

Thanking you very kindly for consideration given, I remain,

Yours very truly,

H. C. STROHM.

STOCKHOLM, WIS.

DEAR SIR: Until a couple of months ago I lived in Minnesota. In view of this fact, I take the liberty to write you and ask you pleadingly to do all you can to support the President's proposition to give a loan to Finland so that she can buy material by which to fight for her freedom and independence. If ever a nation was unjustly and brutally attacked by a giant neighbor, it has been poor Finland. She has put up a wonderful fight so far but must have help. We owe it to her as we owe it to defend a child attacked by a mad dog. If Finland is subdued, all the rest of the small nations will surely go the same way, and the small nations will be reduced to slavery by a few big, brutal powers like Russia. Therefore, Mr. ALEXANDER, do all you can to give her the support she so sorely needs and deserves.

Sincerely yours,

Rev. H. GUSTAFSON.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.

In view of the apparent reluctance of Congress to consider the making of a loan to Finland, I thought you should know that this constituent favors the loan. Certainly the 1 nation out of 18 or so that respected its obligations to the United States stands in a class apart. I do not think the loan would seriously affect our neutral position; but even though it did, that should not prevent the making of it. In this particular matter I am in wholehearted agreement with the President's recommendation, and I hope very strongly that Congress will authorize the loan.

G. A. YOUNGQUIST.

A resolution for the purpose of expressing the sentiment of the Finnish people in the United States toward giving assistance to the Finnish Government by the United States of America and its people

Whereas the Finnish people in this vicinity and in the State of Minnesota are each and all related and are direct descendants of the Finnish people in Finland: Be it further

Resolved, That the Representatives of the people of the United States in Congress pass such laws as will make it possible for the Finnish Government to receive from the Government of the United States of America and from the people of the United States of America loans of money to be used in maintaining their Government.

ADOLPH LUNDQUIST, Chairman.
EYINAR E. RAULEY, Secretary.

The following telegrams were received:

Hon. JOHN G. ALEXANDER: I believe a loan should be granted Finland and hope you will exert your influence in its behalf; your constituents are 98 percent for this loan.

IVAR SIVERTSEN, M. D.

The Norwegian Memorial Church of Minneapolis, Minn., assembled for morning worship Sunday, February 18, instructed me by rising vote to wire you urging quick action in the passage of Finnish loan bill. We urge you support loan for Finland and whatever other support our neutrality laws will permit.

NORWEGIAN GLEE CLUB,
O. J. EIDE,
Corresponding Secretary.

The following oppose any loan to Finland:

Hon. JOHN G. ALEXANDER.

DEAR SIR: Please do anything possible to stop the sending of money to Mannerheim which will only get us into war. Please do the best possible.

Yours truly,

Miss ETHEL OLSON.
G. YOUNG.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE ALEXANDER: Now that Congress is in session, I wish to take this means to discuss with you some of my convictions in regards to legislation. As the war in Europe is going on, it requires us to be constantly on our toes to see to it that our country is not involved. We must be strictly neutral by supporting or making any kind of loans to none, Finland included.

ALBERT OHMAN.

DEAR SIR: The Minneapolis Finnish Workers' Club, at its regular meeting, unanimously went on record protesting the granting of loans, through the United States Government, to any of the European nations, particularly the Finnish Government.

CARL WALDER, Chairman.
MATIAS E. HILL, Secretary.

DEAR SIR: The Ninth Ward Local of the Hennepin County Workers' Alliance unanimously places itself on record protesting the granting of loans by the United States Government to any European nations, particularly to Finland.

JAMES KING, Chairman.
I. L. MYKLEBURST, Secretary.

It seems to me that the sentiment of our section is thus clearly in favor of extending aid to Finland.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MONRONEY].

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Chairman, we have a peculiar situation facing the House this afternoon in the opposition to the pending bill. Those who oppose the bill as reported by the committee make two points. In the first place, they state that the bill will not help Finland at all, and the second point is it will help Finland so much that it might involve us in an international situation.

I agree with my distinguished friend and colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALLEN] when he spoke about the need of this country giving aid and help to Finland at this time. It is to the Members of the House who feel sympathetic toward Finland that I would like to address my remarks at this time.

I hate to see this matter delayed. I hate to see this bill, which will mean a loan of $20,000,000 to Finland for nonmilitary supplies and help, delayed through long weeks of legislative bickering. I am confident if the bill goes through in amended form, such as some of the Members have suggested, it will mean a long tie-up through legislative processes, and in the meantime the 4,000,000 people of Finland will bleed and die while they try to hold the line for democracy. I marvel at their bravery when I think of the fight that the Finns are making on the Karelian Isthmus, and I am sure almost every American feels the same way. When history is written on this great battle I would be satisfied, indeed, if we had sent $20,000,000 of American money into that conflict to help stem the wave of bolshevism and communism. If I thought it would do any good to amend this bill, if I thought it would help Finland any more, I would be willing to go along with those who want to amend it; but after reading the testimony and hearing the men who have spoken on this matter, after having read the Senate hearings, I am convinced this is the best way to give aid to Finland, and in a way that they need it the most—now.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONRONEY. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. Under the Fish amendment the loan would have to be made to Finland?

Mr. MONRONEY. Yes.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. In other words, that would change the whole policy of the Export-Import Bank Act and also the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act?

Mr. MONRONEY. Indeed it would.

Mr. BROWN of Georgia. In one instance there would not be any discretion and in connection with the rest of the money every discretion could be used?

Mr. MONRONEY. If amended, this bill would have to go to the other side of the Capitol, there to be debated all over again, and I fear aid would not be given to Finland in time for them to meet their pressing need insofar as supplies are concerned. Some Members have criticized the fact that the bill only provides for nonmilitary supplies. I took the occasion to call the Chief of Staff of the War Department to ask his offices just what percent of every dollar is necessary for implements of war, and he informed me that so far as the United States is concerned from 24 to 28 cents out of every dollar in time of war is used for implements of war.

The other 72 to 76 cents is for nonmilitary supplies. I asked if this figure varied materially insofar as foreign countries were concerned and was told it would probably go up to 33 cents out of every dollar for military weapons and about 66 cents out of every dollar for nonmilitary supplies.

A number of Members who oppose this bill say that Finland is not mentioned in the bill. I believe that is the proper way to bring in the bill. No country is mentioned in the bill. We leave it up to a lending agency to investigate and determine. No one heard any criticism when the $10,000,000 loan was first announced, and I do not believe there was a protest written to a single Member of the House against that $10,000,000 that was advanced by the Export-Import Bank.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. I yield the gentleman 3 additional minutes.

Mr. MONRONEY. Mr. Chairman, now that the $10,000,000 is practically used up and gone, we are merely trying to make possible another loan of $20,000,000 to Finland. I say it is our duty to do that. I do not believe that governmental policy would be best served by this Congress going on record as authorizing a direct loan to any foreign country, but we can turn it over to the regularly established institutions of this Government to handle.

It has been said by a number of men on the floor that Finland is not mentioned in this bill, and that we have no assurance that Finland will receive any aid whatsoever. The President sent us a message on January 16 in which he stated:

> There is without doubt in the United States a great desire for some action to assist Finland to finance the purchase of agricultural surpluses and manufactured products, not including implements of war. * * * It seems to me that the most reasonable approach would be action by the Congress authorizing an increase in the revolving credit fund of the Export-Import Bank and authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to purchase loans and securities from the Export-Import Bank to enable it to finance exportation of agricultural surpluses and manufactured products, not including implements of war.

Are you still afraid that Finland will not be considered for the $20,000,000? The Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs and the Senate Banking Committee heard testimony that virtually indicated a part of this loan would be used to help Finland. The Senate Banking Committee also heard that testimony; then the author of the bill appropriating and directing a $60,000,000 loan to Finland revised his bill and brought it out in this form. Still there are members who say that Finland will get no help whatever from the bill. We have heard this testimony in the committee and the members of our committee are satisfied that some help will be given Finland under the terms of this bill in a proper, judicious manner.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SECREST].

Mr. SECREST. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my own remarks at this point in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SECREST]?

There was no objection.

Mr. SECREST. Mr. Chairman, not many weeks ago the peace-loving peoples of the world were stirred with resentment by the aggression of Russia's powerful belligerent dictatorship against the small, peaceful nation of Finland. This kind of aggression was not new, for we had seen the same thing happen in China, in Abyssinia, in Austria, in Poland, and in Czechoslovakia.

Our American sense of right and justice was shocked by each of these barbarous and bloody acts. But when sprawling and mighty Russia's Stalinese gangsters began to bombard and shell the borders of our friendly and debt-paying sister democracy, Finland, American indignation swept to a peak of condemnation of the unprovoked attack. Every cherished ideal of American liberty and fairness was at stake and a sentiment of sympathy filled our country with the desire to aid our neighbor. Because of this sentiment, we are today debating a proposal to aid Finland by lending her $20,000,000 for nonmilitary purchases.

But it is time that this Nation examine its methods of helpfulness. By our acts, this Nation is not a friend of peaceful nations ruthlessly attacked but is becoming a partner in the crime of death and destruction.

We are a friend of China. The springs of private charity flowed to relieve suffering millions. Our Nation made much-needed loans to the Chinese Government. We sympathized with her in her tribulation and extended our hand in help. But with the other hand we were aiding her aggressor Japan with the absolutely essential trade to sustain its war machine in its campaign of indiscriminate slaughter. We have been a party to this grinding of a nation of 400,000,000 humans to dust and abject slavery.

This country is Japan's only source of material for the prosecution of her war. Other nations either will not sell or have nothing to sell that they do not need themselves. Japan depends almost entirely on America for her iron, steel, trucks, copper, lumber, alloys, leather, and gasoline. In November, the largest shipment of high-octane aviation gasoline in 2 years, nearly 2,000,000 gallons in one vessel, left our shores for Japan.

We aid the Chinese by loans and donations. On the other hand, we buy Japan's silk, glassware, pottery, cotton goods, and American flags and trade her planes to bomb the Chinese, gasoline to fly the planes, copper for munitions, and scrap iron that later becomes bloody shrapnel.

We now propose to aid Finland by lending her $20,000,000 to be used for nonmilitary purchases. Such a proposal is a sham and a gesture just as has been our aid to China.

Beyond doubt, Finland can use food, clothing, and nonmilitary supplies but any American, through the Red Cross, can donate money for these purposes now if he cares to do so. This bill is not the way to help Finland. The only way is to stop sending war material to Russia. A small army like Finland's, no matter how well supplied, prepared, and positioned, cannot withstand the tremendous odds of manpower, plus American airplanes, machine guns, and ammunition. With no reserves they may hold their lines in battles of 6 or 8 days' duration, but they must give ground from sheer exhaustion when faced by a dictator who values human life less than a hair from his grizzled head and whose hordes are driven on endlessly for 10, 12, or 15 days over the grist of comrades' bones.

As long as Russia can get supplies for her enormous Army, Finland cannot hope to win no matter how well she may be supplied unless she has additional men. We cannot give Finland such aid but we can still help, and help her effectively.

Only recently there was made public part of a report by the French military intelligence on the real military strength of Russia. This report reveals that under its impressive surface appearance, Russia's war machine is a chaos of incompetence. Aside from the fact that purges have taken from service nearly every able military scientist, Russia's industrial plant is ill-managed, ill-manned, and lags far behind in the production of such war essentials as iron, steel, electric power, and fuels. Much of her war equipment is mechanically imperfect.

Russia knows this fact and is following the example of Japan by turning to the United States where war supplies can be bought since the Neutrality Act was amended, contrary to my conviction and vote. In the last few months we have become Red Russia's No. 1 source of war materials. Fifty percent of the total United States exports to Russia last year left our shores in the last 4 months of the year while Russia was preparing her attack on Finland. Ninety percent of these Russian purchases consisted of tools, machinery, and materials vitally necessary in wartime. Nearly all shipments to Russia in January consisted of copper and metal-working machinery. Commerce figures show that all the gasoline purchases made by Russia in 1939 were made in the last 3 months of the year. During 1939 we sold Russia airplanes, airplane engines, and airplane parts.

We are supplying the credit in America for these purchases in buying gold at $35 an ounce which is produced there for $11 an ounce. In 1939 the United States purchased $50,000,000 worth of Russian gold. Early this month a direct shipment of gold from Russia reached the west coast. We paid Russia $5,500,000 for this single shipment. Russia buys war necessities here with those dollars to fight the Finnish people we propose to aid today. We propose to help Finland as we have helped the Chinese. We are proposing to continue the policy of buying goods and gold so that the aggressor nations may purchase war materials while Uncle Sam lends money to the oppressed.

We have not aided China by working both sides of the street, and if we wish to aid Finland we cannot be guilty of the same reprehensible practice. The real help that we can give both China and Finland is to stop further trade in war materials with both nations. That is the one and only effective way to help.

Without access to our markets, Japan's war machine will be hopelessly crippled in a short time. Likewise, denying Russia access to our materials will aid the Finns immeasurably more than a loan for nonmilitary purchases.

When I support such a loan, the buying of Russian gold must be stopped, and Japan must be prohibited from dumping pottery and trinkets on the American market, which constantly adds to our army of unemployed. I will not be guilty of a pretense of feeding and clothing the hungry and naked and at the same time furnishing their enemies with the implements of slaughter.

Furthermore, I do not believe we should increase the lending authority of the Export-Import Bank $100,000,000, when, by the terms of the act, we limit any possible loan to Finland to $20,000,000.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. AUSTIN].

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, it occurs to me that this is the time and this is the place where remarks having to do with our consideration of Finland are in order. I am well aware that in a four-hour debate on a restricted subject there can be little but reiteration. However, an attempt to define, to clarify, may not be amiss. It further occurs to me that discussion of this subject with finality without the evidence before us and without the support of the hearings could be premature. The title of this bill, as the title of many others considered during my short stay here, is deceptive. There is no one in this House that does not recognize the fact that this bill has two intentions. The first is to afford financial credit to Finland, and the second is, under the guise of this financial support to Finland, to increase the capital of the Export-Import Bank for purposes not divulged in the bill and in extension of previous unsuccessful attempts. The deception comes in the fact that the title of this bill does not carry with it a plain, unmistakable intent. The question naturally arises whether the lateness of the hour at which the reports of hearings were made available to the Members is not evidence along this same line. A clear-cut definition of the bill's aim would aid you and me in coming to a decision as to the wisdom of the purpose in view. There then would be no possibility of Members being confronted later on with a charge of inability to maintain a consistent position. This would be apparent if some of us vote for this bill who opposed the previous neutrality bill in the fall of last year. In order to be consistent it is necessary to present a few fundamentals.

At the time of our consideration of the neutrality bill, rejoicing in that pseudonym instead of a truthful title of intervention, England, France, and Germany were "legally at war," even as our interpretation of "legally at war" is applicable. The purpose of that bill was to intervene in an existing war by giving to England and France the opportunity of purchasing arms and munitions of war in this country—it is true for cash and by transportation in their own vessels. It was a purely out and out intervention bill, because it was passed at a time when a state of war did exist between the Allies on the one hand and Germany on the other. Further provisions of that bill regulated our commercial intercourse with those countries because of a declaration by the President that a state of war existed between them. Such a declaration was made. Those of us who voted against that neutrality bill—I think in great part—voted against it because it was a bill carrying deceit on the face of it.

The motivating or evasive purpose in the passage of Senate bill 3069 is to furnish aid to Finland. Whatever our position may have been on the neutrality bill inconsistencies cannot be charged against us, for now we are playing the game according to the new rules. The law is explicit in its implications, and we are perfectly at liberty to conduct ourselves as we please in reference to nations in Europe not declared belligerent by the President or by the Congress or by themselves. There is no war between Russia and Finland. Laugh it off if you will, but, according to our Neutrality Act and because of the silence of our President there is no existing state of war between Russia and Finland, and for that reason no restrictions can be placed upon our commercial intercourse with either one of those nations. I await with interest an explanation by some Member of this House which will convince me that Finland legally, insofar as purchase of arms for cash is concerned, is in any other position than is Italy. Because of all this we are privileged to take a position whereby we can be of financial assistance to Finland. We may not agree with the rules which have been laid down and adopted, but that is the rule which now governs our actions and is the law of the land. What are we trying to do anyway? We are trying to get some money to Finland, but this money has a string on it, and the string is that the use of this money is restricted to the purchase of materials from this country that are of no practical use to Finland in her emergency. What Finland is trying to do is to repel a ruthless invasion, and she needs money to purchase arms for this purpose. If our intent is humanitarian, and we hope to relieve dire suffering in that country either now or in the future, why have we not been, and why are we not now, more materially solicitous about the distressed populations of Poland and Czechoslovakia? Let us be frank about this thing. We want to aid Finland and we want to aid Finland by arms and munitions of war.

The method of procedure outlined in this bill is to increase the lending authority of the Export-Import Bank of Washington by $100,000,000. What you and I are trying to do is to make it possible to put to the credit of Finland at this time $20,000,000. I want somebody to tell me, if that is your intent and my intent, why this bill calls for $100,000,000, and for what purposes are the remaining $80,000,000 intended. When we remember that the loans of this bank are available to stimulate commerce, one naturally wonders what commerce exists between Finland and this country to be stimulated. Regulations of the Export-Import Bank, according to Mr. Jones, frown upon any loan where there is no certainty of return. If we pass this bill exactly as it is, there is absolutely no certainty that the $20,000,000 intended for Finland will be allocated or earmarked for Finland. In the report from the Committee on Banking and Currency of this House the following statement is made:

> Under the provisions of the reported bill the Export-Import Bank may make an additional loan to the Republic of Finland in the aggregate amount of $20,000,000.

Do not let that "may" escape your attention. There is nothing definitive, there is nothing authoritative. There is potentiality only. In answer to a question as brought out by the hearings, Mr. Jones said that the Export-Import Bank would consider this $100,000,000 as intended for general use.

Before we allocate $20,000,000 to Finland a brief survey of her situation in the family of nations today is essential. Legally or otherwise Finland is engaged in a life or death struggle with an antagonist who through sheer weight of numbers is bound ultimately to triumph. Her apparently victorious career of the last two months is destined to be a transient one. The need of Finland today is not for agricultural implements, food, and raw products—materials which are allowed by the President's pronouncement, and fall within the proviso in the bill that the Export-Import Bank of Washington shall not make any loans for the purchase of any articles listed as arms, ammunition, or implements of war by the President of the United States and so forth. What Finland needs today is just those articles which are forbidden, but the paramount need of Finland is men. If her noble army is picked off 50 to 100 men a day where are their reserves? This question is pertinent particularly in view of the fact that her men of 45 have now been called to the colors. The manpower which can preserve Finland from the fate of other victims of totalitarianism must come from England and France or her neighbors. These men are not coming from the United States of America. No matter how much we may applaud the splendid sacrifices, common sense sees the end of Finland, and the $20,000,000 under contemplation will be as fleeting in their effect as a drop of water to a man dying of thirst.

In an attempt to solve a problem of this kind there is no place for sentiment. Certainly Finland has been honest and honorable with us in her debt relationship. Certainly she is a bulwark standing against the foes of liberty, democracy, and religion. Certainly the valor and fortitude of her courageous sons have thrilled an astonished world. But our duty as representing 130,000,000 people is to attempt to interpret the real situation, to separate hysteria from the ordinary principles of government, to bring to the problem an application of judgment and sound sense. The heart of our country may be willing, but the brain of our country must, if it analyze carefully, say "No." A difficult situation, of course, because our desks have been covered with demands that we aid Finland, but the great majority of those demands end up with some expression as this, "Keep us out of war." In the chaotic condition of thought, in the apparent failure of our fellow citizens to look at this problem actuated only by hard and cold common sense, our job is to translate the best of the country's thought into reasonable, effective, and nonparticipating action. No man may foretell the consequence of what we may do today. Perhaps damned if we do and damned if we do not. Are our constituents prepared for what may follow? What will be the attitude of this country if after we pass this bill the newspapers flash day after tomorrow that Russia has broken diplomatic relations with this country? What will be the attitude of our people if two days later Germany, Russia's ally, breaks off diplomatic relations with this country? Are you and they prepared to meet this issue? Such an eventuality would really mean nothing, because Russia and Germany, singly or combined, against this country would be only another evidence of their madness. It would not mean war. Should Finland be able, I cannot say because of the $20,000,000 which we might afford her, to carry on and should she need more than $20,000,000 to carry on longer, does she get it? In this very emergent dilemma we are confronted with the fact that we have not a President who is a leader in the issue. He has hedged; he has attempted to shift responsibility; he will not come out flatly with a definite foreign policy. So this Congress must assume that task for the country with a certain assurance that we may be obliged to follow through.

If this bill passes, and if there be allocated to Finland $20,000,000, and if Finland by barter is able to exchange what she is allowed to purchase from us for military supplies from other countries, are we to continue to allow Russia to buy for cash, because she cannot get on credit, any war materials she may desire from this country? If there can be any more absurd situation than this, or if there can be a more striking paradox, tell me what it is.

Mr. Jones in his testimony before the Banking Committee of this House stated a loan by us to Finland will not make us unneutral, but also will not stop the war—legally nonexistent, but actually existent—between Russia and Finland. Hence, there are certain conclusions to be drawn. Without doubt, the sentiment of this House is to aid Finland insofar as we can. By the same token the almost unanimous sentiment of the country is to the same end. I am positive that a bill, striking straight from the shoulder, that authorized a $20,000,000 credit to Finland would pass this House without serious opposition; but such a bill has not been presented. Only a circuitous method seems available, and those of us who want to help Finland must willy-nilly vote for this bill. It may be possible through amendment to provide definitely for Finland instead of allowing the Export-Import Bank to add it to its general credit system. This will do absolutely no good unless at the same time exportation to Russia by any person, corporation, association in this country of implements of war be forbidden. The passage of such an amendment as just mentioned, and the restriction of exportation of arms to Russia—an amendment to which end I may offer—would strip all of the deceit from the title of this bill and would bring out in the open exactly what we are trying to do. Under these conditions it seems to me that in response to almost universal request we must pass this bill, preferably so amended that the intent of our people may be carried out and our purpose made unmistakably clear. [Applause.]

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SECCOMBE].

Mr. SECCOMBE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert at this point in the RECORD the remarks of my colleague the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BENDER], who is ill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The remarks referred to follow:

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Chairman, the people of our Nation have found themselves in serious dilemmas on international affairs before. We have rarely floundered in more troubled waters than those which surround us today.

I have found no one in my native State of Ohio in sympathy with Russia. We are all fervently hoping that somehow little Finland will be able to accomplish the miracle of the twentieth century. Everyone I know is hoping against hope that one of the smallest nations in the world will stand up and whip the daylights out of the biggest. It is another story of David and Goliath, but the outcome does not promise to be so satisfying.

For those people who insist upon classifications, who want their Representatives neatly pigeon-holed as either "internationalists" or "isolationists," I have always been listed as a traditional "isolationist." All my life I have been influenced by the thinking of such leaders as our late great Senator Borah.

But this time I cannot remain in the ranks of the objective, dispassionate observer.

Finland, one of the few remaining states of the world which cherish democratic ideals, has been ruthlessly attacked by an aggressive, despotic dictatorship. I join the people of America in refusing to swallow the absurd theory of self-defense against a potential invader which Stalin has foisted upon the guillible readers of the Daily Worker. Russia has done in Finland precisely what Japan has done in China. A month ago, Stalin set up in Finland a puppet state, ruled by Communists. He has "recognized" this clique of old Bolsheviks as the "rightful" government of the Finnish people. This is no defensive technique. It is the same kind of blatant imperialism which we can no longer stomach if the world is to be saved from future devastation.

We Americans cannot in honor and morality sit calmly by while one of the most honorable, decent, and deserving nations of the earth is ruthlessly exterminated. We are not asked to contribute men. Finland has proven that she has men. Finland is ready and willing to fight its own battle. It asks for no military intervention. All it needs from our Nation is money. Thousands of men and women, rich and poor, have contributed their private funds to the Finnish cause. They have given of themselves. Our Government is not asked to give. We are asked to lend. We are asked to lend to the only people in the world who have consistently and honestly attempted to live up to their obligations to us.

I say, "Let's stop this juggling." Either we are in smypathy with Finland or we are not. If we are, the Finnish people need more than our tears. They need some help—and they need it now. If we who are the wealthiest nation in the world, if we who are the greatest democracy on earth, refuse to aid this brave nation, to whom shall Finland turn for help?

If that help does not arrive soon, it will be too late to send it at all. I urge that we act immediately, if we are not to bear the eternal shame of deserting the ideals for which we stand in the hour of their greatest trial.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. JOHNS].

Mr. JOHNS. Mr. Chairman, when a similar bill was up for consideration before in this Congress giving power to extend the lending authority of this bank I opposed it because I saw at that time just what is transpiring here today. We have said a good deal about Finland's getting some money here today, but if you read the testimony in the hearings you will find that Finland could have this $20,000,000 without this bill having been brought in here at all. Mr. Jones says there is money there to make a loan to Finland, but someone would have to take some responsibility. The President of the United States and Mr. Jones would have to take some responsibility for making this loan. What they have done is to shift it over to the Congress, with the idea that we should take the responsibility for this loan in case anything happens to this country to get us into war, and also with the idea of getting the additional $80,000,000 that they could not get last year. That is about what this amounts to, stripped of the mask around it.

I am opposed to this bill for numerous reasons. First of all, $20,000,000 would not save any nation, even one the size of Finland, with the power of Russia against it. In the second place, we would have to borrow this money if we loaned it to Finland, or at least a large part of it. We now owe $43,000,000,000, or approximately that amount. We have run in debt at the rate of over $10,000,000 a day since we started this fiscal year. We have spent over $25,000,000 a day during that period of time.

We have 9,000,000 unemployed in this country, and many of them are suffering and need help. It seems to me this would be a pretty good time to think about the 9,000,000 people in this country who are unemployed and to take care of them at this time.

Mr. HAWKS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNS. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. HAWKS. No one has pointed out how much money it takes to conduct a war for even 1 day. How far would $20,000,000 go in conducting a modern war? It would not go even 1 day.

Mr. JOHNS. That is what I say, $20,000,000 would not help anybody, even a nation the size of Finland, which has about 4,000,000 inhabitants.

If we could believe the morning papers, Finland at this time has an agent in this country buying war materials. Of course, if they could get this money, if Mr. Jones would lend it to them, which he does not say he will, and, if so, not for buying war materials, they might spend it in this country for that purpose. I am in favor, of course, of every individual's contributing to help Finland if he possibly can. I went so far as to introduce here in Congress a bill providing that an individual might make a deduction in connection with his income tax for such a contribution, in the same percentage that he does on gifts to charities and churches, and for other purposes, at the present time.

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SOUTH. The gentleman represents an agricultural district in part, I believe. The gentleman does not object to the purchase of farm products to feed and clothe the Finns, rather than the purchase of war materials with which to fight?

Mr. JOHNS. I am very glad the gentleman asked me that question, because this is what has happened with the Export-Import Bank. We have imported into this country, as the gentleman knows, millions of dollars' worth of agricultural products. We exported to the South American countries agricultural implements to the extent of $69,000,000, so that they might raise more of these farm products with cheap labor and ship them into this country, and we loaned them a good deal of the money with which to buy these implements, yet we have exported only about $2,000,000 worth; so as far as helping the farmers of this country or Finland are concerned, I say this loan will not make much difference, because neither will see but little of the money if the loan is ever made.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JOHNS. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I should like to point out that when this bill was under consideration last summer Secretary of Agriculture Wallace gave us strictly to understand that we should not expect this money to be limited to loans that did not bring competitive agricultural products into this country. He took the position that loans of that kind could be made, and that position has been sustained since then and is confirmed in the hearings.

Mr. JOHNS. No question about it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The money can be used to facilitate imports of competitive agricultural products.

Mr. JOHNS. It has been.

Mr. CRAWFORD. What some administrator may say has nothing particularly to do with it, because the law permits it to be done.

Mr. JOHNS. Not only that, but it opens the field here to loaning money to every foreign country to which you might wish to loan it, and just increase it all the time. When this war is over we will be holding the bag, just as we were at the end of the last one and have been ever since, but probably not quite so bad, because so many of these foreign countries are owing us money now that we cannot loan them any more. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. BUCKLER] such time as he may desire.

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I have made the statement on the floor of this House that I will never vote to send our American boys to Europe to fight. I believe that perhaps 95 percent of the American people feel the same way about it as I do.

When Congress convened January 3, I fully expected that we would appropriate at least $30,000,000 for the Finnish people to buy guns and airplanes to protect their country and their lives. But almost 2 months have passed by and we have done practically nothing.

Some say that we do not want to violate the neutrality law. You are not violating the neutrality law when you loan Finland money, because Russia has never declared war on Finland. The Communists of Russia have entered Finland like a thief that enters your home. They have murdered women and children by the thousands and are still at it.

We should have loaned them money 2 months ago to stop this murder. I intend to vote for this bill which would provide food and clothing for the Finnish people. I wonder what good it will do if you wait until they are all murdered. The Finnish people are fighting for their homes, for democracy, and Christianity. They are fighting against an outlaw nation whose leaders do not believe in God and who have sent money to most every nation, including the United States, to set up an organization with the intention of controlling the world. If they are not stopped in Finland now, some day we may have to fight them alone.

It is America's duty to help Finland now, before it is too late. Finland is sacrificing all she has in order that civilization may not perish from this world. The Finnish people have the greatest faith in America. In this hour of her greatest need she has turned to us for help. Are we going to desert little Finland now? We have in the past sold war materials, airplanes, aviation gasoline to her blood-thirsty aggressor, Dictator Stalin. We should not hesitate now to help Finland with money and materials.

The longer we delay the more pleased will be the Communists of Russia and their dictator. The American people, according to the words of President Roosevelt, are about 98 percent in support of little Finland. Why does Congress hesitate, and why has there been so much delay in the approval of a little bit of help for Finland? We must remember that sympathy alone will not help Finland save its nation. Finland needs financial help immediately, and it would be un-American and an act of ingratitude to the Finnish people, as Finland is the only country that paid the United States its honest debts.

What is the use of spending money to investigate un-American activities if we do not practice Americanism and democracy now? If Finland goes down in defeat—and it certainly will without outside assistance—Stalin will be well on the way to ruling all of Europe. I think we should help Finland at once.

While I am in sympathy and want to help the Finnish people, I am fully aware of our own serious problems at home. There are millions of unemployed; there are millions of needy and distressed on relief; thousands of farmers are losing their homes; millions of them do not receive enough to live decently. In view of this situation in our own country, we might hesitate in loaning to Finland if we were without resources. But we have eighteen billions in gold buried in Kentucky. There is plenty of money to take care of our farm problem, our needy, and our unemployed, if there is a will to do so.

I hope the Members of Congress will also help our own people, and they can if they will only do it, since we have plenty of money and plenty of resources and plenty of everything.

Virtually all of the people of my own district, the Ninth of Minnesota, are supporting the drive for Finnish relief, and they also are favorable to this loan to Finland.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FADDIS] such time as he may desire.

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Chairman, by their heroic efforts to preserve their independence, the Finns have earned the admiration of the liberty-loving peoples of the world. Against overwhelming odds and superior matériel they have waged a fight which has been, and still is, one of the outstanding feats of military achievement of all times. From the first it seemed as though it would be utterly impossible and only a futile gesture to attempt to even delay the hordes of communistic conscripts which were hurled upon them. Their almost superhuman resistance thus far proves to what heights of heroism and sacrifice a liberty-loving people will rise in defense of their homeland.

Their invasion is but the first step toward fastening upon the world by force of arms the ideology of the hammer and sickle, which the International Communist Party has failed to fasten by infiltration.

Other nations in the path of this "red" colossus are stupefied by terror. They have not engaged in war for so many generations that the instinct of self-preservation is dormant. They have not dared to strike a blow even while they have the advantage of the full strength of the Finnish spearhead. Helpless in their servile panic, they can only gaze in terror-stricken awe at their inevitable defeat in detail and ultimate doom unless outside influences interfere to effect their salvation. Forgotten are their days of martial might. Faded are their national ideals. Fear has replaced reason. Sapped and softened by wealth and security furnished by others, impregnated by unsound pacifism, their national impotence makes them a fair target for international imposition. The other Scandinavian nations seem to prefer subjection and slavery to timely self-defense.

Valiant Finland, however, is not of this mind. They won their independence on the battlefield at a date not so far distant but that the event is still fresh in their minds. They know from bitter experience that there are calamities far worse than war and that national slavery is one of these. They know that there are "certain inalienable rights," among which are "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," which are worth fighting for. They know that without freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and freedom of religion life would not be worth living. In defense of western civilization, Christianity, and democracy they have dared to appeal their cause to the god of battles. Is there anyone here who will say that in this crisis they do not deserve assistance?

Some may argue that we are too late in this our meager contribution to the cause of Christianity and democracy. No one at this time can say whether or not this be true. The Finns have been resisting invasion with nature fighting for the invaders. Finland is a land of lakes and swamps and bogs. At the present time ice has turned the entire nation into one vast highway, favorable for the transportation of supplies, troops, and matériel. With the coming of spring the country will change into a vast morass, which will constitute a barrier against any except very light vehicles. Each isthmus between the lakes will be a bottleneck, where the strength of the defenders will be multiplied and the defense facilitated. The knowledge of the country and terrain, the interior lines of communication, and the handicaps placed on the enemy will all operate to the advantage of the Finns. By the time the country is once more accessible to heavy transportation it is quite likely that the attention of the invading hordes will be attracted elsewhere.

The question is: Shall we loan Finland money; and if so, how shall we make the loan? Some wish to loan it so it can only be used for the purchase of so-called nonmilitary supplies. This would be impossible. Today any essential supply is a munition of war—food, clothing, medicine—they are as much a part of a plan of blockade as are guns, shells, powder, or bombs. If we intend to assist Finland, let us give her the choice of whatever material assistance she needs. We are a powerful Nation. We believe in the cause of justice, both national and international. Can it be said of us that we dare not do what we believe to be right? If we make an unrestricted loan to Finland, we are violating no law of our own. Russia herself has said she is not at war with Finland. She is only going into Finland on a peaceful mission to assist the Finns to police their nation, so to speak. Let us also assist the Finns to police their nation.

The contention that an unrestricted loan to Finland would be objectionable to Russia is a curious one, to say the least. What scruples has the Soviet Government ever observed in their dealings with us? Have they kept any of their promises made when we resumed diplomatic relations with them? They have violated their pledges to us as they have violated their pledges to all of the world, including their own people. Have they not violated their pledged word and in every conceivable manner attempted to undermine our institutions and form of government? What, I ask you, do we owe to Soviet Russia? What psychology influences those who attempt to defend her cowardly and dastardly attack on Finland, or her insidious attempt to inoculate this Nation with communism?

In Europe today two schools of thought are locked in mortal combat. Totalitarianism is endeavoring to crush democracy and impose its will and institutions upon the rest of the world. Democracy is endeavoring to defend its institutions and its rights to survive. The outcome of this war will determine what kind of world we will live in in the future. We cannot ignore the fact that we are vitally concerned in the ultimate result of this struggle. Let us rise to this occasion and exercise one of our perfectly legitimate national functions by making the Finns an unrestricted loan according to the dictates of our conscience and regardless of the wishes of a nation which has no knowledge of truth, honor, democracy, or Christianity.

By virtue of the timely assistance which we received from France in that dark hour of our history when we were struggling to achieve our independence; by virtue of all we owe to the ideals of justice, democracy, humanity, and Christianity let us give something more tangible than mere sympathy upon this occasion. Let us extend an unrestricted loan to this courageous, heroic nation which observes its international obligations. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOOK].

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order there is not a quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and one Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, I have a smile of satisfaction on my face this afternoon because of the fact that way back in 1935, before most of the Members of this House even realized there was such a nationality as Finns in the United States, I introduced a bill for the erection of a legation building at Helsinki, Finland, and at that time stated to this House the fact that the Finnish Nation was the only nation that had paid her debts to the United States. I spoke about the characteristics of the Finns—their loyalty to integrity, their democratic spirit, and their peace-loving qualities.

Then following that I had the satisfaction of suggesting that Finland be invited to participate in the Delaware Tercentennary. I refer you to my speech of August 21, 1937. I went into the history of the Finnish people and showed where, 138 years before the Declaration of Independence, the Finns were helping to settle this Nation, and then on October 16 of this year I addressed this House and advised Russia that any overt act toward that stalwart little democracy of Finland on her part might arouse the emotions of the American people to such an extent that aid would be given to that little democratic country by the United States because of the demand of the people. That time has come.

Yes; it has been a fight with me from the very beginning on behalf of recognition of that great and stalwart republic, and on the 3d of January of this year I introduced in the Congress a bill for an unrestricted loan of $60,000,000 to Finland. Let us go into the history of this thing. What happened after that bill was introduced? I went over to the other side of this Capitol and arranged with a Senator, the author of this bill, to introduce a bill that has finally ended in the form that it comes here on the floor. He introduced a bill for an increase in the authority of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of $60,000,000 and an unrestricted loan at my request after a lengthy conference. There is no doubt that we can extend such a loan to Finland without any breach of neutrality.

I still have hopes we may authorize an unrestricted loan of $60,000,000 to Finland, but we must be practical in this matter. An amendment that would add $60,000,000 to this bill or an amendment that would definitely change this bill to such an extent that it would have to necessarily go back to the Senate; I do not believe that such an amendment would throw it into conference. If this bill would be forced into conference, it would be of no use to the nation of Finland because they need help now.

Yes; there are those who can say, "I want a direct loan," or "I want to help Finland," or "I want to help her stop the communistic hordes of Russia, but I cannot go for this measure." I say that I am going to vote for any bill that will aid Finland in her time of need. I care not whether it is restricted or unrestricted. This bill will aid to a degree because she can buy many things that will help her; and what are they? Let me read what Senator BROWN, of Michigan, has to say—and I agree with him:

> The important needs of the army are divided into four classes—transportation, foods and medicines, general supplies, shelter, and personal equipment. In transportation the army needs horses, mules, harnesses, saddles, wagons, railroad engines, rolling stock, motortrucks, automobiles, and, most important, oil and gasoline. You must remember that transportation in Finland is largely by water. They have 2,500 miles of interior water navigation; motorboats, rowboats, pontoons, steel for bridges are all needed and may be purchased under this bill. In communication there is telephone and radio equipment. In the line of foods and medicines there are all foods, including forage for the horses and mules, hay, oats, etc. There are first-aid kits, splints, surgical instruments, medicines of all kinds. In shelter and personal individual equipment, canvas tents, blankets, sleeping bags, mittens, socks, shoes, boots, earmuffs, all clothing, civilian gas masks, binoculars, parachutes—all of which may be purchased in the United States under this bill. Finally, in the line of general supplies, there are searchlights, which are badly needed for the spotting of airplanes, sound detectors, barbed wire, which is most valuable for defensive purposes, and many other articles too numerous to mention. All of these things not only may be purchased but they are essential, and their supply under this bill will leave funds and credits which the Finns have with other nations available for the purchase of shot and shell, or gun and plane, which we cannot under our law furnish.

I intend to offer an amendment for an unrestricted loan of $60,000,000 to Finland. I hope you will see fit to pass it.

If that does not prevail, I intend to offer an amendment for an earmarking of $20,000,000 to Finland, without restrictions.

In addition to this bill I have a bill, H. R. 7631, which provides for a refund of all interest paid by Finland to the United States on her debt to the United States, which amounts to approximately $5,000,000. I know you would not want us to hold interest on the loan that we made to Finland. This bill is now before the Ways and Means Committee and should be voted out. This would help Finland considerably without in any way affecting our neutrality. I could talk for an hour on this, but my speeches have been made from time to time and I hope you agree with me that we should help Finland now, so she can save herself and hold the lines for Christendom and democracy. Help Finland; do not just talk about it. An unrestricted loan of $60,000,000 would be the best insurance policy we could buy against the spread of communism or atheism in this country. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE].

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, I believe that the President was right when he stated that 98 percent of the people of America desire to aid heroic little Finland in her fight to preserve her Government and her traditions and ideals. An individual must, indeed, be cold and heartless not to be stirred by the heroic deeds of the defenders of this small nation. Their exploits have aroused the imagination and the heroic impulses of people throughout the world, and certainly those in America who love liberty respond to the urge to help Finland.

On the other hand, there is an all-compelling urge manifested by 100 percent of the people of this Nation that we take no action that may tend to involve us in European wars. The people of America demand of the Congress that they take no steps that may result in the necessity of sending American soldiers to shed their blood upon foreign battlefields.

Torn between the emotional desire to help Finland in her fight against the communistic hordes of Russia, and the equally strong urge to stay out of European involvement and entanglement, conscientious Members of Congress are faced with a very distressing and disturbing dilemma. We have before us the picture of the events that transpired in 1916 and 1917, which surely but inevitably drew us into the European war. We do not want that experience repeated. The administration, however, vacillating from day to day in its foreign policy and making strained interpretations of international law and our neutrality policy, say that the making of a loan to Finland for the purchase of nonmilitary supplies will not involve us in foreign entanglements. The administration, seeking to appease the urge of the people of this Nation to aid Finland, have permitted the propaganda to go out to the Nation that the measure now before the House is an answer to the needs of Finland.

I want to briefly analyze this bill and to let the people of the Nation who expect this Government to help Finland know that there is not a single word in the proposal now before the House which guarantees the loan of a single dollar to Finland.

In the last session of Congress, the President offered his now famous lend-and-spend bill and incorporated in that bill was a proposal to increase the capital of the Export-Import Bank from $100,000,000 to $200,000,000. This proposal was defeated by the Congress. The President, however, never accepts a defeat, and it is as apparent as any fact of history that the proposal now before the House is an attempt on the part of the administration to stir up sympathy for Finland and by that medium secure the enactment of substantially the same legislation that the House repudiated in the last session of Congress.

The pending bill simply provides that the authorized capital of the Export-Import Bank be increased from $100,000,000 to $200,000,000, and in the hearings before the House Banking and Currency Committee, Mr. Jesse Jones, the head of the Federal lending agency, testified that the passage of this bill ought not to be based upon the assumption that a loan would be made to Finland in any amount and he definitely stated, as shown on page 36 of the hearings: "I think if you do not want to pass this bill for general purposes, it should not be passed." All through his testimony he was very frank in stating that this is not a Finnish loan bill but a bill to increase the authority of the Export-Import Bank to enable it to carry on its general activities. He further stated that if Finland made application for a loan to the Export-Import Bank, the directors of that institution would determine whether such a loan would be made, based upon conditions existing at the time of the application.

Thus it is apparent that in the passage of this bill, Congress is not voting a loan to Finland but is giving to the Export-Import Bank extended authority to carry on its business under the guise and pressure that a loan to Finland is involved. The fact is that if the Export-Import Bank wanted to aid Finland, it could do it immediately out of funds now available by the simple procedure of canceling commitments heretofore made by the bank and not used to date. The testimony discloses that the bank has $34,000,000 that could be used for this purpose if the emergency were as grave as the promoters of this legislation seek to indicate.

The bill provides that the aggregate amount of loans to any one foreign country and the agencies and nationals thereof shall at no time exceed $20,000,000 in addition to amounts previously authorized or made. However, a further proviso is contained in the bill that the Export-Import Bank of Washington shall not make any loans to any government which was in default in the payment of its obligations or any part thereof to the Government of the United States on April 13, 1934. This proviso does not, in my judgment, do what the country has been led to believe was intended. Let me amplify this statement somewhat.

The Johnson Act, previously passed by the Congress, prohibits loans to governments that are in default, but specifically exempts public corporations created pursuant to special authorization of Congress or a corporation in which the Government of the United States has or exercises a controlling interest through stock ownership or otherwise. It is thus apparent that the Export-Import Bank is not precluded under this so-called Johnson Act from making loans to any government regardless of whether they have defaulted on previous loans or not. The proviso, therefore, in the pending legislation attempts to restrict the activities of the Export-Import Bank and prevent it from making loans to any government which was in default. It will be noted that this proviso does not include the words contained in the first proviso, namely, "Foreign country and the agencies and nationals thereof," but only uses the word "government." Therefore it appears perfectly clear that the Export-Import Bank, which is a Government corporation set up by special authorization of the Congress, may, despite the second proviso in the pending legislation, make a loan to a foreign agency set up by a foreign government that is in default on its prior loans from the United States Government. Under the terms of this act, if the authority of the Export-Import Bank is extended by increasing its capital from $100,000,000 to $200,000,000 and Great Britain and France were to set up a corporation in this country known as the French or English Trading Corporation, the Export-Import Bank could loan money to that corporation owned and controlled by the Government of France or England, when under the terms of the proviso it could not make a loan direct to the English Government or the French Government.

It is apparent, therefore, that as the war progresses, perhaps England will ask for a $20,000,000 loan, and perhaps France may ask for a loan through the medium of a corporation established in this country, and we may be loaning money indirectly to governments which the Johnson Act and this second proviso in the pending bill seek to prevent.

I repeat that the pending legislation promises nothing to Finland, and its proponents have been fair enough to openly state on the floor of the House that the Finnish loan question is not embodied in this legislation. It seems to me, in view of the urge from the people in this country, that the Congress of the United States should come out into the open and fearlessly and frankly decide whether or not they want to make a loan to Finland for the purpose of aiding her in her fight against Russia. Thus the question would be one readily understood by the people of the Nation. Instead of doing this, however, Congress, as has been its practice all during the present administration, is delegating its power and authority into the hands of a private corporation known as the Export-Import Bank, thus allowing the directors of that corporation, instead of the Congress, to determine whether a loan shall be made to Finland.

To me, the whole procedure stultifies the conscience of a thinking Member of Congress, and a vote for this bill is neither a vote for a loan to Finland nor a vote against a loan to Finland. Those who have cleverly guided the publicity on this subject have caused the people of the country to believe that a vote against this bill is a vote against a loan to Finland, and a vote for the bill is a vote to aid Finland. Neither represents the true fact, and I trust that when the time for amendment of this bill comes, amendments will be offered which will show this piece of legislation up in its true light and that Members of Congress will be called upon to vote their honest convictions either in favor of or against a loan to Finland.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, my sympathies run entirely in one direction, and I suppose that is in accord with the general sympathy of the country. That is, naturally, as a great powerful nation, we would like to step in somewhere, somehow, and help a small republic with its back to the wall fighting for liberty. There are some things that are rather inconsistent in regard to our position. Each speaker who has taken the floor has pointed out that we must be meticulous in not issuing war materials to Finland, though that is exactly what they need. On the other hand, what are we doing so far as Russia is concerned? From the very start we have been pouring our war supplies into Russia. We have been financing Russia by buying her gold at $35 an ounce, which means a profit to her of perhaps $24 an ounce, and we shipped her 450 engines for bombing planes, and quite a large number of bombing planes themselves have been sent over there; so that while we are shedding tears about Finland, we are responsible for blasting out the lives of women and children behind the lines while their menfolk are at the front fighting for liberty. I have the figures here from the Department of Commerce. They show what has been happening. In 1939, in October, we shipped no copper at all to Russia. In November we shipped $1,082,000 worth; in December, $4,376,000 worth, and January of this year—and I have just obtained the figures from the Department—we sent $6,997,000 worth of copper to Russia; metal-working machinery, $2,205,000; brass and bronze, $631,000; petroleum products, $187,000. So we are talking about a loan to Finland; that is, what we would like to do to help Finland, and at the same time we are furnishing materials to destroy Finland.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I have not the time. I maintain that is an inconsistency. We should stop this shipment of war materials to Russia if we want to help Finland, and I hope somebody will offer such an amendment on the floor. That is not all. I want you to stop and think of a few more things in regard to this. We are helping the aggressor nations with our shipments of war materials. Our exports to 13 neutral countries around Germany have increased 47 percent within the last few months, while our exports to the Allies increased only about 10 percent. So we find ourselves, with all of our financial power, helping aggressor nations—those who are trying to crush those nations who stand for our form of government—the parliamentary system.

I give you another thought to think about, and all you have to do is to read the English magazines to find out about it yourselves. Naturally the English are looking out for themselves, and her policy is to keep all employees in her export factories employed in their present positions, to hold their markets, to be prepared to gain any loss in her markets after the war is over, but she says, "We will buy our finished war materials so far as we can from the United States, which is out of the range of bombing planes, and then we will not have to face the social dislocation which will follow the war."

So while you are building up war exports by this type of a bill, you will have an aftermath, after the war, just as you did after the World War. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to notify the House of an amendment that will be offered, as I think both sides of the House are entitled to know what that amendment will be.

After striking out the conditions on the second page of the bill insert:

Provided further, That the Export-Import Bank of Washington is authorized to loan to Finland on proper application not to exceed $20,000,000, without restriction on the type of merchandise to be purchased in the United States.

The Export-Import Bank would not then be forced to loan to Finland. It would be only an expressed authorization. If Mr. Jones thinks they can repay it, he would lend it to them; but it would at least provide an opportunity for the Members of this House to say that they had voted a Finnish loan, or at least tried to do something for Finland.

The threat was made over the heads of those in another body, with no mention made of Finland in the bill, that "If you vote against this bill you vote against Finland. If you vote for the bill it will be a vote for Finland."

The gentleman from Missouri spoke today about a certain Senator presenting a bill for $60,000,000, and then afterward concluded that that was not the orderly way, and supported the bill as it came from the Senate. Did you hear that Senator over the radio last evening? If you did, I hardly think you can reconcile the statements. Some of us, like that Senator, have to accept, in the last analysis, the best we can get. I again refer to the amendment that will be offered and we will then see whether we will vote for or against Finland. It does not force the bank to make the loan, but it does help out a little in forcing the expression that Finland should, if possible, have a share of this one hundred millions.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. If we have the power to provide for a loan through the Export-Import Bank for limited purposes, without violation of international law, why do we not have the power to make a straight loan without restriction?

Mr. GIFFORD. We have, and we ought to have the courage to do it. [Applause.]

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. GORE. May I say it is not a question of the power, but a question of advisability.

Mr. GIFFORD. Advisability? Possibly. Yes. We are afraid of something. Afraid of whom I do not know. Afraid of what I do not know. Are you afraid of Russia? Are you afraid of violating some international law that nobody seems to know much about or cares to explain? Finland is free to accept and we are free to give her any sort of loan. She is not in default. We attempt here to describe her as a belligerent making a needed loan impossible.

Ninety-eight percent of the people ought to be represented in this body.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. As has so often been stated this afternoon, the Export-Import Bank has made a loan to Finland and Finland has withdrawn 70 or 80 percent of that—eight million of the ten million, has she not?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The Export-Import Bank could now make a loan to Finland if it wanted to give Finland preference on the commitment, to some other commitment.

Mr. GIFFORD. Certainly they could. They have $34,000,000 available today. It is committed, but only partially so. It probably will not all be taken up. This trying to pry $100,000,000 more over poor little Finland takes away my appetite for the bill.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Is the gentleman attempting to convey to this House, on his responsibility as a Member, that the Banking and Currency Committee brought this bill in under fraud?

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, no.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Then what are you insinuating for and snarling about?

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, this came from another body. This is an administration measure. There is no fraud about it. It is not a fraud, it is smart politics. Let us acknowledge that is the way you are trying to bring it about. I did not call it a fraud.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. The gentleman is attempting to make out it is a fraud.

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, I did not say anything about fraud. I congratulate you on being so smart.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CRAWFORD. As a matter of fact, this bill is based on a special letter or message in the form of a letter sent to the House, is it not?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes. This is the spend-lend bill—a portion of it, of fragrant memory.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. A $10,000,000 loan has been extended to Finland, of which $8,000,000 has been used for munitions of war or for agricultural products and manufactures.

Mr. GIFFORD. I do not know about that. I agree with the attitude of the majority leader, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], that they may buy food from us, but if they wish they may trade that food for munitions of war, and it is none of our business if they do.

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. But does the gentleman know that it has been done?

Mr. GIFFORD. No; but if I cannot lend the gentleman money with which to buy a gun, but do lend him money with which to buy something else, and he trades that something else to his next-door neighbor for a gun, I cannot help that.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield.

Mr. TREADWAY. I realize the gentleman's knowledge of the subject matter. Will the gentleman inform a colleague the manner in which that colleague can vote and show sympathy for Finland by saying that he wants $20,000,000 lent to Finland instead of voting for a $100,000,000 fund for somebody else to use?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes; that colleague can vote for the amendment to be offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER], a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency, an amendment which I hope will be offered as a motion to recommit, coupled with a cut of $50,000,000 of the $100,000,000.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will that then make the terms of the bill such that Finland herself can secure $20,000,000 from the Treasury of the United States, as we have asked to have done?

Mr. GIFFORD. No; but the bill should be so amended as to give Mr. Jones the chance to make that loan if he cares to. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MURDOCK].

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Mr. Chairman, I favor the legislation before us both on sentimental and on business grounds. There are some of us who would like to do more than this bill does for Finland, but I believe that the practical and common-sense thing to do is to pass this bill as it is, for if we amend it and it has to go through conference, there will be greater delay and possibly its passage will be delayed until no help at all can be extended to Finland.

As has been said by those who preceded me, especially by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALLEN], a recollection of our own hour of need and the significant help afforded us by France back in 1778 should prompt us to extend a helping hand, under similar circumstances if not in exactly the same way, to Finland. Such are the sentimental grounds on which I favor this measure. The business grounds, briefly stated, are that this lending agency of the Government has already done a great piece of work in promoting our foreign trade. The institution has done so in a business-like way, and I believe will continue to use good business methods. So I favor that portion of the bill, other than the relief extended Finland, on business grounds. Although I favor the relief to Finland on sentimental grounds, it is to a certain degree upon business grounds also. It would certainly be good business, to say the least, if by the extension of a little financial aid now we can keep the free peoples of Scandinavia between Russia and the Atlantic Ocean. If our money could accomplish that feat, in my opinion, it would be good business to furnish the money, even without the formality of a loan.

Those who do not want to facilitate foreign trade through this institution of the Government, but who do want to extend aid to Finland, may offer amendments to make direct loans specifically to Finland. Would such a move be a service or a disservice to Finland? Any amendment to this bill, which in its present provisions carries some aid to Finland, in an effort to furnish more direct aid to this courageous and admirable people, would have the effect of throwing the whole legislation into conference and delay. Now we have seen evidence that conference reports are sometimes long delayed. Such a conference report might not be brought back to this Chamber for several weeks and thus the long delay thwart the very purpose of our attempted aid to Finland. I think it unwise to attempt such amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. PATRICK] 2 minutes.

Mr. PATRICK. Mr. Chairman, I had a lot I intended to say, but there is not time. Let us get right down to the facts.

This is merely a way in which to do business. This organization has been going on since 1934, this Export-Import Bank, and its operations have been profitable. It is a very excellent way to do business. It has encouraged imports that we wanted to encourage. Remember, too, that not one loss has been sustained and not a single default is outstanding.

Every reasonable assumption may be had that Finland will get the loan. Nobody doubts that. The gentleman in authority, Mr. Jones, has already looked it over. So why defeat their plan of doing business, why divert the channel through which we have so successfully been encouraging the export of our manufactured and agricultural products, one which has proven a successful channel in the hands of the safest people perhaps in the United States of America? Let us not hamstring the legislation or the agency through which this business is done. Let us use good common business sense and exercise calm and reasonable judgment, avoiding either extreme of lending to Finland at every hazard on the one hand or making no loan whatever on the other. Handling this bill sensibly and calmly we shall have exactly what we want. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. IZAC].

Mr. IZAC. Mr. Chairman, I like the work of the Export-Import Bank. I think it has done a good job. As a complement to the reciprocal-trade policies I think it is all right, but I am not going to talk to you today about that. I am going to talk about the effect some of the proposed amendments will have on the war in Europe.

Some of our friends want us to lend directly to Finland a certain amount of this money. I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, it is too late. They do not need any money now. What they need is guns, ammunition, planes, and a few destroyers out there in the Baltic. That is what they need. You are not going to give these to them, I take it, under this bill. But I will tell you why that would be far better. If we could cause a stalemate on the Karelian Isthmus it would mean, in the first place, concentrating the war south of that line. It would save the lives of untold numbers of men, women, and children. It would mean limiting the depredations caused by the nations to the south and confining the war to that theater alone. Second, if the Finns hold the Karelian Isthmus, you will not be barraged with pitiful appeals from our people of Scandinavian extraction to come to their aid in the face of further attacks of the Russian hordes. Wait and see if I am not right. If the Russians break through the Karelian Isthmus, they are on the way through Sweden, Denmark, and Norway, and then when Russia gets to the Atlantic and becomes an Atlantic power, the balance of power in the Atlantic is vitally disturbed. You would then have not only the British Fleet, which I never feared, but you would have another fleet. You know as long as there is Canada to the north of us we do not have to worry about the British Fleet. They are too vulnerable; and, besides, I think our Navy can whip them any day of the year. But when you have another power coming into the Atlantic you are disturbing the balance that exists there today.

There is another factor. You are going to cause hostilities to break out in other parts of the world unless you contain the Russians where they are, and I do not say this because I hate the Russians or because I love the Finns so much; but I am thinking of America. The instant you build up any other power and cause the conflagration to spread into other parts of the world, you are hurting our own country, and in self-defense we have to build up likewise. It is as my friend the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ALLEN] stated, the instant you permit the gangster to rise in any locality it means the expenditure of more money, because you have to increase the police force to put him down. And so it is in international affairs. It causes a great expense, and our people wonder why you and I keep voting more money for national defense. Let us restrict this war where it should be restricted and do something to help the Finns save their homes. I would say that in the interests of my own country, whether it was Finland or any other nation that was affected. It just happens that geographically that is where the war hurts us.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IZAC. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. REES of Kansas. I am interested, because the gentleman knows more about the horrors of war than most anyone on the floor of the House.

Mr. IZAC. I think not.

Mr. REES of Kansas. What does the gentleman suggest that we actually do about furnishing arms and ammunition to Finland? What should we do about that?

Mr. IZAC. Under the terms of the Neutrality Act, we do not deny ourselves the right to let them have any excess surplus material that we have, and we have a lot of it left over from the World War.

Mr. REES of Kansas. Then the gentleman would authorize in some way the shipment of arms and munitions direct to Finland?

Mr. IZAC. That would be my idea; make it possible for them to defend their homes and at the same time fight humanity's battle for us all. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be read for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 9 of the act approved January 31, 1935 (49 Stat. 4), as amended, is amended (1) by striking out "$100,000,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$200,000,000", and (2) by inserting before the period at the end thereof a colon and the following: "Provided further, That the aggregate amount of loans to any one foreign country and the agencies and nationals thereof which are hereafter authorized to be made and are outstanding at any one time shall not exceed $20,000,000, and such amount shall be in addition to the amount of loans heretofore authorized or made to such foreign country and the agencies and nationals thereof: Provided further, That the Export-Import Bank of Washington shall not make any loans in violation of international law as interpreted by the Department of State or for the purchase of any articles listed as arms, ammunition, or implements of war by the President of the United States in accordance with the Neutrality Act of 1939."

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 5, after the word "loans", insert "to any government which was in default in the payment of its obligation or any part thereof to the Government of the United States on April 13, 1934, or."

Page 2, line 9, after the word "articles", insert "except aircraft exclusively for commercial purposes."

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PARSONS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill S. 3069, to provide for increasing authority of the Export-Import Bank of Washington, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DONDERO]?

There was no objection.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, I am unwilling that this day should pass without making some reference to the birth of a great American. The month of February is significant in the birthdays of great Americans. Not only do we have Washington and Lincoln, but 133 years ago today in the city of Portland, Maine, there came upon this earth a very illustrious American, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, one of that great and beloved company of illustrious and famous American poets to whom we owe a great deal, and who contributed much to the literature of this country.

Appropriate exercises were held this morning at his monument on Connecticut Avenue here in the city of Washington. There are very few Members of this House who do not recall with keen delight, inspiration, and benefit, the reading of his Psalm of Life, his Rainy Day, his Children's Hour, Paul Revere's Ride, and the story of Evangeline.

The Nation recently paid tribute to the memory of this illustrious American poet by the issuance of a postage stamp bearing his likeness.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD, and include therein a short statement prepared by the International Longfellow Society of Portland, Maine.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

To lovers of Longfellow:

There are few names as well known the world over as that of Longfellow.

For 18 years the beloved poet was one of Harvard's greatest professors.

He lived the greater part of his life, he wrote his immortal works, and died within a short walk of the university.

Surely every American has many reasons to be proud of the name and fame of Longfellow. For the past 25 years the International Longfellow Society has cherished it and actively promoted it in many lands.

The noble old colonial home in which he was born now needs attention for its present preservation as well as permanent endowment.

To accomplish such purpose, and for placing 100 mammoth steel plate engravings of Longfellow, each autographed both by the poet and the artist, in strategic locations round the world, as outlined below, your assistance is needed and urged. Few endeavors are more worthy or will longer endure.

We hope to be honored with your permission to add your name to the list of honorary members of the International Longfellow Society, a distinction accepted with many expressions of appreciation by 5 Presidents of the United States, as well as 100 presidents of colleges and Governors of States, and more than 1,000 organizations representing every State in the Union and every country in the world.

To aid world-wide preservation and promotion of the name and fame of the world-beloved poet, Longfellow, and to present to Their Majesties King George and Queen Elizabeth in appreciation of their friendly visit to America, and in recognition of the great love for Longfellow throughout the British Empire; and to President and Mrs. Roosevelt; and to the Governor General of Canada; to the capitols of 100 States and nations; to the United States Embassy in London and the United States Legation in Ottawa; to Harvard University; and the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, England; to the Congressional Library at Washington; the Portland (Maine) Public Library; the Maine Historical Society; and the New York and San Francisco World's Fairs; Marshall's great engraving of Longfellow, each autographed both by the poet and the artist and valued at $500 each, you are urged to contribute $2, $5, $10, $100, or $500, as may suit your convenience.

Checks should be made payable to the International Longfellow Society or the Portland Historical Society.

Your contribution will be much appreciated and gratefully acknowledged by the International Longfellow Society and the Portland Historical Society.

I am advised by the Public Printer that this material will take up 4½ pages, and the cost will be $192. I want the House to know this before permission is granted to include the material.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. VOORHIS of California asked and was given permission to extend his own remarks in the RECORD.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1940

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our blessed heavenly Father, we pray Thee to make manifest to us that which is entire truth, honor, and fidelity that these virtues may be swept into the treasury of our daily conduct. We come to Thee that we may have life that is not a mere existence written in a wounded past and a halting future but life rich, unfailing, ever deepening and eternal: Oh, this is life eternal that we may know Thee, the only true God, Jesus Christ, whom Thou hast sent. Our gratitude rises to Thee that the old world hopes and aspirations come winging through the radiance of Thy glory. Oh just to be in a living world to labor and walk its kindly, brotherly ways and be alive more and more! Enable us to heed the messages to the churches of old: "Be thou faithful unto death and I will give thee a crown of life." Glory be to the Father and to the Son and to the Holy Ghost; as it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be, world without end. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

UNIFORM SYSTEM OF BANKRUPTCY

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 1935) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand there is unity of opinion as to this bill among the members of the committee at the present time?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN. That is correct, Mr. Speaker. It has the unanimous approval of the Judiciary Committee which considered it.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. I have no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 75 of the act of July 1, 1898, entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 75. (a) Every United States district court of bankruptcy shall appoint referees to be known as conciliation commissioners, who need not be lawyers, but must otherwise have the qualifications of referees. One or more such commissioners shall be appointed for each division or for the territory served by the city where terms of court are held.

"A conciliation commissioner shall have a term of office for 4 years and shall hold office until his successor is appointed and qualified but may be removed by the court for cause. He must be a resident of the division or the territory served by the city where terms of court are held. He must be familiar with agricultural conditions and must not have been or be engaged in the farm mortgage, banking, or farm-financing business. The court, if it deems it advisable, may appoint some suitable person as supervising conciliation commissioner in each judicial district who shall have such supervising conciliation functions as the court may by order specify, including the holding of hearings.

"(b) A farmer-debtor who is insolvent or unable to meet his debts as they mature may, at any time prior to March 4, 1944, file a voluntary petition in bankruptcy. The petition of the farmer-debtor shall be accompanied by his schedules in triplicate and shall be filed with the clerk of the court, but the conciliation commissioner may receive same and promptly transmit it to the clerk for filing. The filing of the petition with the clerk of court or the leaving of it with the conciliation commissioner for filing with the clerk shall be notice to all persons and officials and to all Federal and State courts. It shall automatically stay all judicial or official proceedings in all Federal and State courts and shall stay all levies, executions, actions, or proceedings under the direction of any official or person against the farmer-debtor or any of his property, including the sale of any of the farmer-debtor's property under the terms of any deed of trust.

"The provisions of this section shall apply to all judicial or official proceedings in any court or under the direction of any official, and shall apply to all creditors, public or private, including any Federal corporation or Federal agency, and to all of the farmer-debtor's property, wherever located: Provided, That the debts having priority of payment under title 11, chapter 7, section 104, of the United States Code, for bankrupt estates, shall have priority of payment, in the same order as set forth in said section 104, under the provisions of this section, in any distribution, assignment, composition, or settlement herein provided for: Provided further, That nothing in this section shall affect the allowance and exemptions of farmer-debtors as are provided for bankrupts under title 11, chapter 3, section 24, of the United States Code. All such allowances and exemptions shall be set aside for the use of the farmer-debtor in the manner provided for bankrupts.

"Such farmer-debtor may, at the time of filing his petition or at the time of the first or subsequent hearings, petition the court that all of his property, wherever located, whether pledged, encumbered, or unencumbered, be appraised, and that his unencumbered exemptions, and unencumbered interest or equity in his exemptions, as prescribed by State law, be set aside to him, and that he be allowed to retain possession, under the supervision and control of the court, of any part or parcel or all of the remainder of his property, including his encumbered exemptions, under the terms and conditions set forth in this section. Upon such a request being made, the conciliation commissioner, under the jurisdiction of the court, shall designate and appoint appraisers, as provided for in this act.

"Such appraisers shall appraise all of the property of the farmer-debtor, wherever located, at its then fair and reasonable market value. The appraisals shall be made in all other respects with rights of objections, exceptions, and appeals, in accordance with this act: Provided, That in proceedings under this section, either party may file objections, exceptions, and take appeals within 30 days from the date that the conciliation commissioner approves the appraisal.

"(c) After the value of the farmer-debtor's property shall have been fixed by the appraisal herein provided, the conciliation commissioner shall issue an order setting aside to such farmer-debtor his unencumbered exemptions, and his unencumbered interest or equity in his exemptions, as prescribed by the State law. He shall further order that the possession, under the supervision and control of the court, of any part or parcel or all of the remainder of the farmer-debtor's property shall remain in the farmer-debtor, according with the request in the petition, subject, however, to all existing mortgages, liens, pledges, or encumbrances. All such existing mortgages, liens, pledges, or encumbrances shall remain in full force and effect, and the property, up to the value judicially ascertained or determined under the provisions of this section, covered by such mortgages, liens, pledges, or encumbrances, shall be subject to the payment of the claims of the secured creditors as their interests may appear.

"(d) The filing of the petition with the clerk of court, or the leaving of it with the conciliation commissioner for filing with the clerk, shall immediately subject the farmer-debtor and all his property, including contracts for purchase, contracts for deed, or conditional sales contracts, the right or the equity of redemption or where a trust deed has been given as security, or any equity or any right in any such property, wherever located, to the exclusive and sole jurisdiction of the court.

"In all cases where, at the time of filing the petition, the period of redemption has not or had not expired, or where the right under a deed of trust has not or had not become absolute, or where the sale has not or had not been confirmed, or where deed had not been delivered, the period of redemption shall be extended or the confirmation of sale withheld for the period necessary for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this section. The words 'period of redemption' wherever they occur in this section shall include any State moratorium, whether established by legislative enactment or executive proclamation, or where the period of redemption has been extended by a judicial decree.

"In proceedings under this section, except as otherwise provided herein, the jurisdiction and powers of the courts, the title, powers, and duties of its officers, the duties of the farmer-debtor, and the rights and liabilities of all creditors, and of all persons with respect to the property of the farmer-debtor and the jurisdiction of the appellate courts, shall be the same as if a decree of adjudication had been entered under other provisions of this act.

"(e) When the conditions set forth in this section have been complied with, the court shall enter an order continuing the stay of all judicial or official proceedings in any court, or under the direction of any official, against the farmer-debtor or any of his property of which he retains possession, for a period of 3 years. During such 3 years the farmer-debtor shall be permitted to retain possession of all or any part of his property, in the custody and under the supervision and control of the court, provided he pays a reasonable rental annually or semiannually as the court may direct for that part of the unexempt property of which he retains possession. The first payment of such rental shall be made within 1 year of the date of the order granting the petition for possession and staying proceedings for 3 years, the amount and kind of such rental to be the usual customary rental in the community where the property is located, based upon the rental value, net income, and earning capacity of the property. The provisions of this subsection are mandatory and not discretionary with the court.

"Such rental shall be paid into court, to be used, first, for the payment of taxes, insurance, and upkeep of the property, conciliation commissioner's fees, and the remainder to be distributed among the secured and unsecured creditors, and applied on their claims, as their interests may appear. The court, in its discretion, if it deems it necessary to protect the creditors from loss by the estate, or to conserve the security, may order sold any unexempt perishable property of the farmer-debtor, such as fruits, vegetables, and the products of poultry, dairy and livestock, or any unexempt personal property not reasonably necessary for the farming operations of the farmer-debtor. The court may, in addition to the rental, require payments on the principal due and owing by the farmer-debtor to the secured or unsecured creditors in accordance with the provisions of this Act, and may require such payments to be made quarterly, semiannually, or annually, not inconsistent with the protection of the rights of the creditors and the farmer-debtor's ability to pay, with a view of his financial rehabilitation.

"(f) At the end of 3 years, or prior thereto, if he so desires, the farmer-debtor may pay into court the amount of the appraised value of the property of which he retains possession, including the amount of encumbrances on his exemptions, up to the amount of the appraised value, less any amount paid on principal: Provided, That upon request of any secured or unsecured creditor, or upon request of the farmer-debtor, the court shall cause a reappraisal of the farmer-debtor's property, or in its discretion set a date for hearing, and after such hearing, fix the value of the property, in accordance with the evidence submitted: Provided, however, That upon request in writing by any creditor the court shall proceed to ascertain the value of the property by trial the same as in condemnation proceedings.

"The farmer-debtor shall then have 90 days within which to pay the value so determined by the court together with 5 percent per annum interest into court, less any payments made on the principal, for distribution to all secured and unsecured creditors as their interests may appear. He may, at the same time, apply for his discharge as provided for in this act. Thereupon, the court shall by an order turn over full and complete possession and title of such property, free and clear of any and all encumbrances, to the farmer-debtor and grant his discharge.

"Any farmer who filed a petition under section 75 of the act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved July 1, 1898, as amended, and in whose case a bankruptcy court has, under subsection (s) thereof, granted a stay of proceedings may, if the period for which such stay was granted has expired or is about to expire, make application to such court for an extension of such stay. If the court finds that such farmer has substantially complied with the provisions of paragraph (2) of subsection (s) of section 75 of such act, as amended, during the period of such 3-year stay then the court may extend the period of such stay from year to year not to exceed 2 years additional stay.

"If, however, the farmer-debtor at any time fails to comply with the provisions of this section, or with any lawful orders of the court made pursuant to this section, or is unable to refinance himself within 3 years, the court may then order the appointment of a trustee, and order the property sold or otherwise disposed of as otherwise provided for in bankruptcy proceedings in this act. But, except as otherwise herein provided, the court shall not dismiss the proceeding without complete liquidation and discharge of the farmer-debtor.

"(g) Upon notice previously given to the farmer-debtor and to all secured and unsecured creditors by the conciliation commissioner, the farmer-debtor or any creditor, at the first or any subsequent meeting of the creditors, may offer terms of composition or extension or both. The proposal thus made shall be made the basis of negotiation and it shall be the duty of the conciliation commissioner to preside and to endeavor to bring about a composition or extension of time or both in a manner that will be just and equitable to all the creditors and to the farmer-debtor. The composition shall not be less nor more than the value of the property as ascertained or established under provisions of this section; but nothing herein shall prevent the reduction of the future rate of interest on all debts of the farmer-debtor, whether secured or unsecured. If a composition or extension of time, or both, has been approved by the court, then the court may dismiss the petition but not otherwise.

"When a composition or extension proposal has been accepted in writing by the farmer-debtor and by a majority in number of all the creditors whose claims have been allowed, including secured creditors whose claims are affected, which number shall represent a majority and amount of such claims, then the court shall confirm the proposal if satisfied that it includes an equitable and feasible method of liquidation for secured creditors and of financial rehabilitation for the farmer-debtor and is for the best interest of all the creditors. And the court shall then dismiss the petition but not otherwise.

"(h) The conciliation commissioner shall promptly call the first meeting of creditors. He shall give notice of the date and place of such meeting to the farmer-debtor and to all creditors, secured or unsecured, as provided for in this act. The commissioner shall enclose with the notice a summary of the inventory, a brief statement of the farmer's indebtedness as shown by the schedules, and a list of the names and addresses of the secured and unsecured creditors, with the amounts owing to each as shown by the schedules. At the first or subsequent meeting of the creditors the farmer-debtor may be examined, and the creditors may appoint a committee to submit to the conciliation commissioner a supplementary inventory of the farmer-debtor's estate. There shall be prepared by, or under the supervision of, the conciliation commissioner a final inventory of the farmer-debtor's estate. In the preparation of such inventory the commissioner shall give due consideration to the schedules filed by the farmer-debtor and to any supplementary inventory filed by the committee of the creditors.

"(i) The conciliation commissioner shall receive as compensation for his services a fee of $25 for each case submitted to him, and when docketed, to be paid out of the Treasury. He shall receive such additional fees for his services as may be allowed by the court, not to exceed $50 in any one case, to be paid out of the rental or the bankrupt's estate. The supervising conciliation commissioner shall receive as compensation for his services a per diem allowance to be fixed by the court in an amount not in excess of $8 per day, together with subsistence and traveling expenses, in accordance with the law applicable to officers of the Department of Justice. Such compensation and expenses shall be paid out of the Treasury.

"The conciliation commissioner may accept and avail himself of office space, equipment, and assistance furnished him by other Federal officials, or by any State, county, or public official. He shall be entitled to transmit in the mails, free of postage, under cover of a penalty envelope, all matters which relate exclusively to the business of the courts, including notices to creditors.

"(j) For the purposes of this section, section 4 (b), and section 74, the term 'farmer-debtor' includes not only an individual who is primarily bona fide personally engaged in producing products of the soil, but also any individual who is primarily bona fide personally engaged in dairy farming, the production of poultry or livestock, or the production of poultry products or livestock products in their unmanufactured state, or the principal part of whose income is derived from any one or more of the foregoing operations, and includes the personal representative of a deceased farmer-debtor; and a farmer-debtor shall be deemed a resident of any county in which such operations occur. The word 'act' wherever it occurs in this section shall mean the General Bankruptcy Act as amended, and the word 'section' means section 75 of the act as herein amended.

"(k) The provisions of this section shall be held to apply also to partnerships, common, entirety, joint, community ownerships, or to farming corporations where at least 65 percent of the stock is owned by actual farmer-debtors, and any such parties may join in one petition. It shall also apply to all cases now pending in any Federal or State court; and all cases that have been dismissed by any conciliation commissioner, referee, or court shall be promptly reinstated without any additional filing fees or charges: Provided, That the farmer-debtor at the time of his application for reinstatement has not been completely divested of all his interest or equity in or title to or in any or all of his property. Any farmer-debtor who has filed under the General Bankruptcy Act may take advantage of this section upon written request to the court; and a previous discharge of the farmer-debtor under any other section of this act shall not be ground for denying him the benefits of this section. A farmer-debtor may, upon motion, transfer his petition from section 75 to proceedings under the general bankruptcy provisions of this act.

"(l) Upon filing of any petition by a farmer-debtor under this section there shall be paid a fee of $10, to be transmitted to the clerk of the court and covered into the Treasury. No additional fees or cost of administration or supervision of any kind shall be charged to, or exacted from, the farmer-debtor, but all such additional filing fees or cost of administration or supervision shall be charged against the bankrupt's estate

"(m) The Supreme Court is authorized to make such general orders as it finds necessary properly to govern the administration of the office of conciliation commissioner and proceedings under this section. Until such general orders are made the district courts shall follow the general orders previously made for procedure under this section. In regard to procedure the provisions of the General Bankruptcy Act shall apply as far as they are applicable to this section. If the court in its discretion deems it best, it may continue the present conciliation commissioner or referee in cases pending when this amendment becomes effective."

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That section 75 (c) of the act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved July 1, 1898, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(c) At any time prior to March 4, 1944, a petition may be filed by any farmer, stating that the farmer is insolvent or unable to meet his debts as they mature, and that it is desirable to effect a composition or an extension of time to pay his debts. The petition or answer of the farmer shall be accompanied by his schedules. The petition and answer shall be filed with the court, but shall, on request of the farmer or creditor, be received by the conciliation commissioner for the county in which the farmer resides and promptly transmitted by him to the clerk of the court for filing. If any such petition is filed, an order of adjudication shall not be entered except as provided hereinafter in this section."

SEC. 2. Section 75 (r) of such act is amended to read as follows:

"(r) For the purposes of this section and section 4 (b) the term 'farmer' includes not only an individual who is primarily bona fide personally engaged in producing products of the soil, but also any individual who is primarily bona fide personally engaged in dairy farming, the production of poultry or livestock, or the production of poultry products or livestock products in their unmanufactured state, or the principal part of whose income is derived from any one or more of the foregoing operations, and includes the personal representative of a deceased farmer; and a farmer shall be deemed a resident of any county in which such operations occur."

Amend the title.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to extend until March 4, 1944, the time during which petitions may be filed by farmers under section 75 of the Bankruptcy Act."

GENERAL VON STEUBEN

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, 37 years ago today the Congress of the United States appropriated $50,000 for a statue in honor of a famous German soldier. This soldier was Baron Frederick Wilhelm Augustus Ferdinand von Steuben. General von Steuben was born in Prussia on November 15, 1730. He was the son of an Army officer and at an early age became an officer in the German Army. General von Steuben served with distinction during the Seven Years' War for German liberty.

On September 26, 1777, he sailed for America with several aides and an interpreter, and on December 1 landed at Portsmouth, N. H. General von Steuben offered his services to the cause of the American colonists at a time when they were badly needed. In doing this he sacrificed a secure career in his own country and devoted his entire skill and experience, which had been acquired over a long period of years under the greatest military masters of Europe, to the cause of American independence. He told Congress that he asked for neither pay nor rank, but would enter as a volunteer and perform any duty the commander in chief might assign him. The Congress then passed the following resolution:

Whereas Baron Steuben, a lieutenant general in foreign service, has in a most disinterested and heroic manner offered his services to these States as a volunteer:

Resolved, That the President present the thanks of Congress, in behalf of these United States, to Baron Steuben for the zeal he has shown for the cause of America and the disinterested tender he has been pleased to make of his military talents, and inform him that Congress cheerfully accepts of his services as a volunteer in the Army of these States, and wish him to repair to General Washington's quarters as soon as convenient.

General von Steuben was appointed inspector general of the Army with the rank of major general. His greatest success was in training the recruits in the elements of warfare. His heart was in this task. No part of the work was beneath him. He arose at dawn and labored all day. Probably the chief cause of his great success was due to the confidence he inspired in the officers and men. They knew that he was a thorough master of the art of warfare and they obeyed his orders with implicit confidence.

The Continental Army had no manual of instruction. The soldiers marched in Indian file. Nearly every officer instructed his men in his own method. General von Steuben immediately sensed the difficulty of training an army under those conditions. He wrote a book, which was used for years by the American Army, and was known as Steuben's Regulations, or the Blue Book. Six months after General von Steuben started training the American soldiers the precision of their maneuvers played a prominent part in the success of the Army on the battlefield. General Washington congratulated General von Steuben and said that the officers of the Army and the soldiers now felt that they were a match for the well-trained British troops. All of General von Steuben's success was not confined to the drill field. In the siege of Cornwallis at Yorktown General von Steuben commanded one of the three divisions that composed the Continental Army. It was General von Steuben's division that occupied the forward trenches when Cornwallis surrendered to Washington on September 19, 1781.

At the time of the Revolutionary War a large part of the population of the Colonies was formed by people of German birth or descent. It has been estimated that they composed over one-twelfth of the entire population. At the start of the war very little is heard of these Germans, not because of their want of zeal and enthusiasm but because of their modesty. They prefered to have the people of English origin discuss the violation of English liberties and to decide what steps should be taken. When the decision was made that the Colonies would resist the British by force there was no group of people more patriotic or determined than the Germans to see that justice was achieved.

I think that it is only fitting at this time, when Germany brings to many minds the thought of Hitlerism and nazi-ism, that we should consider the qualities of the German people. For several years these great people have been forced to suffer under the yoke of an ambitious dictator. The Germans no longer enjoy the freedom and liberty, which they so long cherished and which many of their leaders helped the American Colonies obtain. General von Steuben was only one of many Germans who offered his sword and services to this country. The pages of history are filled with the names and deeds of Germans who came here to help the colonists gain their freedom and liberty.

The great part the German people played in the successful prosecution of the Revolutionary War has never been fully appreciated in America. Neither these brave colonists nor their descendants have claimed the praise which is their just due. [Applause.]

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. BENDER. Mr. Speaker, yesterday more than 100,000 people in the State of Ohio went to the polls to vote in two special congressional elections. In the Twenty-second Congressional District of Ohio the Republican Party had the privilege of electing Ohio's first woman Representative to this House, Mrs. FRANCES P. BOLTON, the charming and talented widow of our late friend Chester C. Bolton.

In the Seventeenth District of Ohio a bitter contest took place. The Republican nominee was HARRY MCGREGOR, speaker of the Ohio House of Representatives. On the Democratic ticket was a nephew of the late Representative William Ashbrook, who bore the same name. Leading Democrats and Republicans went into this district to battle for their views. Gov. John W. Bricker spoke for the Republican Party. The New Deal was the basic issue of the campaign. Governor Bricker's work in providing assistance for the needy was attacked and defended.

Today the votes have been counted, and the Ohio congressional delegation has added two additional Republicans to the rolls. A Democratic district has gone Republican by a decisive margin. The people of Ohio have made their views clear. In both districts they have repudiated the New Deal policies. The Republican program has been vindicated. This November we are going to rewrite the old proverb. It will be ,"As Ohio goes, so goes the Nation." And there is no doubt where Ohio is going. We are going forward to normalcy—back to the Republican Party. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a brief editorial appearing in the Shelbyville Republican on February 26.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein an address by Harold E. Cockley, of Palmyra, Pa.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

RECIPROCAL-TRADE AGREEMENTS

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I also ask unanimous consent to include in my remarks three short excerpts from the Oregonian.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, in the Oregon and Washington House delegations on the recent vote on the extension of the reciprocal trade agreements law only one member of the delegations voted for the extension.

The Pomona Grange, of Multnomah County, Oreg., which is in my district, and which is a county-wide organization, recently held a meeting, and there were 225 voting. They voted nearly unanimously against an extension of the reciprocal trade agreements law. There was also a poll taken in my district by the Oregonian with reference to this matter, and only 22 percent voted to extend the law.

An editorial in the Oregonian of recent date stated that "lumber has been 'sold down the river' and it will stay 'sold down the river' unless and until a change in policy is forced by political overthrow of those who are directing foreign trade relations."

Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to include in my remarks excerpts from the Portland Oregonian of date February 23, 1940, referring to the matters to which I have called attention.

The matter referred to follows:

[From the Portland Oregonian of February 23, 1940]

TRADE-PACT MERITS PUZZLE HALF PORTLAND'S VOTERS, FIGURES OF FRONT-DOOR BALLOT-BOX CANVASS REVEAL

(By Dan E. Clark II, director, Front-Door Ballot Box)

More than half the voters of Portland still have no opinion regarding reciprocal-trade agreements, although most political observers agree this question will be one of the major issues in the coming Presidential election.

Among the voters who have made up their minds on the subject there are more who would allow the program to lapse than those who favor extending the President's power to make the agreements.

These facts were indicated by a survey just completed by the Oregonian Front-Door Ballot Box, an opinion study based on a scientifically stratified sample of Portland voters.

ONE-FIFTH FAVOR EXTENSION

When asked, "In your opinion, should Congress extend this authority to the President or permit it to lapse next June?" voters would answer as follows, according to the survey:

	Percent
Extend	22
Allow to lapse	27
No opinion	51

Voters first were asked, "Have you heard of the act of Congress, passed over 4 years ago, which permits the President to make reciprocal-trade agreements with foreign countries?"

Twenty-nine percent of Portland's voters have not even heard of the act, according to the study.

The next question, designed to indicate whether or not the individual understood the reciprocal trade agreements program, asked, "Can you describe, briefly, what these trade agreements have generally provided for?"

FEW UNDERSTAND SITUATION

Only 11 percent of this city's voters can give even an approximate description, the survey shows. The remaining 89 percent do not even understand it to be a tariff program.

Many voters admitted they were "hazy about the whole thing."

"You scratch my back, I scratch yours," was the explanation given by one woman.

A lumberman said the only thing he knew about the agreements was "they want a certain amount of lumber to come in from Canada."

MEN SLIGHTLY BETTER INFORMED

"It has something to do with 'help the Finns,'" suggested a woman mill worker.

The study shows men to be somewhat better informed on the subject than women. The following percentages were indicated:

	Percent understand	Percent don't understand
Men	16	84
Women	7	93

A break-down into age groups showed voters under 30 years old to be the poorest informed on the subject of reciprocity agreements. Percentages follow:

	Percent understand	Percent don't understand
21–29	4	96
30–49	14	86
50 and over	11	89

Best informed among the various income groups are those receiving incomes above average. Of this group, 36 percent could describe the reciprocity program.

Another break-down on this question showed Republicans are five times as well informed on the subject as Democrats, and persons who voted for Landon in 1936 six times as well informed as those who voted for Roosevelt.

BOTH SEXES VOTE SIMILARLY

Asked whether the President's power to negotiate the agreements should be extended or allowed to lapse, men and women answered in approximately equal proportions. Percentages follow:

	Percent extend	Percent allow lapse	Percent no opinion
Men	30	36	34
Women	15	20	65

Of the various income brackets, those having incomes above the average are strongest in opposition to the agreements, the survey shows, 49 percent of this group saying they think the program should be allowed to lapse.

POMONA RAPS TRADE PACTS—RENEWAL OPPOSED BY FARM GROUP

(By Paul Laartz, staff writer, the Oregonian)

GRESHAM, February 22.—Urging restoration of the treaty-making power "to the President and Congress as specified in the Constitution," Multonomah County Pomona Grange, Wednesday, declared itself on record by resolution in opposition to renewal of reciprocal-trade agreements.

The Pomona, meeting at Pleasant Valley Grange, near here, asserted in the resolution that the 21 present treaties have worked handicaps on farming, lumbering, and other Northwest industries, and urged that Oregon's congressional delegation oppose their renewal.

MILK LAW SUPPORTED

Rescinding its action of last November, the 225 grangers attending the Pomona sessions voted nearly unanimously in support of a resolution endorsing the State milk-control law.

Last November the Pomona voted opposition to the milk-control law, but after hearing discussion by dairymen Wednesday turned their approval to it.

Twenty candidates were initiated into the fifth degree in ceremonies Wednesday night. Speakers during the day's meeting included Oscar Hagg, of Hillsboro, Jersey leader, and Bonneville project representatives.

[From the Portland Oregonian of February 23, 1940]

NEIGHBORS FIRST

The fallacious trade and tariff theories of the State Department did not encourage hope of concession to the Northwest lumber interests with respect to the Canadian reciprocal-trade agreement. The lumber interests showed that the 15-percent depreciation of Canadian currency enabled Canadian producers still further to undersell the United States product in the United States market. It did no good.

Already having an advantage over the American producer by reason of lower wage scales, lower taxes, and other factors, the currency depreciation reduces still further the cost of Canadian lumber to the American buyer. American dollars now exchange for a greater number of Canadian dollars than when the trade agreement was written, and the cheaper Canadian dollars will buy as much Canadian lumber as the dearer Canadian dollars formerly bought. But so plain a situation gains no sympathy or relief. Lumber representatives have been turned down.

While the depreciation of Canadian currency lowered the American tariff in effect, it raised the Canadian tariff in effect. A given number of Canadian dollars now exchange for a smaller number of American dollars; therefore, American typewriters and automobiles cost the Canadian purchaser more than formerly.

The Canadian agreement was written with the purpose of encouraging sale of eastern manufactures to Canada, and with disregard for the well-being of the American lumber industry and certain branches of agriculture.

If lumber now be given more tariff protection, presumably Canada will sell less lumber in the United States and have less money wherewith to buy eastern manufactures, which have in effect gone up in price so far as the Canadian buyer is concerned. The State Department values foreign sales more than domestic sales, in that it rejects the rational view that if the United States lumber producer and the United States farmer are secured the domestic market, they will buy just as much eastern manufactures as could be sold in Canada by turning over the United States market to Canada for Canadian lumber and Canadian farm products. And if lumber be given its justifiable tariff concession, concessions will be demanded for other domestic products.

Lumber has been "sold down the river," and it will stay "sold down the river" unless and until a change in policy is forced by political overthrow of those who are directing foreign trade relations.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. THILL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include two short newspaper articles and a letter from the Secretary of State.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include some facts about the World War.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include a copy of a speech by Hon. John Lord O'Brian, delivered at Buffalo, at the meeting of the Bar Association of New York State, on the Spirit of Remonstrance.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PICKETING

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute, and to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, on the $12,000,000 Supreme Court Building, across its front, where everyone walking past may see, are these words: "Equal Justice Under Law."

Within 300 feet to the north and west, just across the street facing it, stands the Methodist Building, owned and operated by the Temperance Board of the Methodist Church, and in which a Mrs. Miller, after others failed, is successfully operating a cafeteria which serves two meals a day and at which some of the Members of the Senate and of the House take their meals.

Some of her employees belong to a union; some do not, but there is no labor dispute; there has been no controversy over wages, hours, or working conditions; nor has any employee made any demand upon her which has not been granted.

Nevertheless, within the shadow of the Supreme Court which carries this legend, "Equal Justice Under Law," day after day, morning and evening, before the entrance to the cafeteria march pickets carrying placards bearing the legend that she is unfair to organized labor, giving false information as to the wages paid.

Let me repeat: Within the shadow cast by the Supreme Court Building, as the sun comes up in the east, is this Methodist Building owned by a religious organization; the cafeteria operated by an American citizen who has violated no law and who, under the decision of the Supreme Court in New Negro Alliance v. Grocery Co. (303 U. S. 552) and the decision in Fur Workers' Union v. H. Zirkin & Sons, Inc. (105 Fed. (2d) 1), affirmed by the United States Supreme Court on December 11, 1939, construing the Norris-LaGuardia and the National Labor Relations Acts, must submit to this slander and unfair treatment. This administration extends the strong arm of the Federal Government to protect those pickets who are slandering this woman, who has neither violated the Wage-Hour Act, the National Labor Relations Act, nor committed any other wrong. And the pickets are there in an effort to force the employees to join an organization which they do not wish to join. The pickets are there to levy and collect tribute from employees. We here in Congress refuse by our inaction to give relief to her or to her employees, though knowing that her case and theirs is typical of hundreds of thousands of others.

If you want to amend the National Labor Relations Act, sign petition No. 23, which I have placed there for the purpose of getting action on the National Labor Relations Act at this session.

"Equal Justice Under Law." As Mrs. Miller walks out of her place of business each day; as her employees leave for their homes; as Representatives, Senators, and others who patronize her leave the doors and look across at the Supreme Court Building; as the foreigner within our gates reads those words, "Equal Justice Under Law"; then look across at the pickets, and remember the untruthfulness of the placards carried—how strange, how filled with hypocrisy, those words must seem to him, to her, and to us.

INCREASING LENDING AUTHORITY OF THE EXPORT-IMPORT BANK OF WASHINGTON

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 3069) to provide for increasing the lending authority of the Export-Import Bank of Washington, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of S. 3069, with Mr. PARSONS in the chair.

The Clerk reported the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 2, line 5, after the word "loans", insert "to any government which was in default in the payment of its obligations or any part thereof to the Government of the United States on April 13, 1934."

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, yesterday afternoon the attendance was so small that many gentlemen may not have heard the argument. The debate was long and probably few have been able to read it in the RECORD. Therefore it may be of some service to gentlemen to sum up that argument and, as fairly as possible, lay before you the differences of opinion.

There developed no hostility to a loan to Finland. As far as I could see, the House was unanimous in wishing to help Finland. As to how we should do it, there developed a great diversity of opinion. At one extreme were those who thought we ought to make an outright gift to Finland. This, however, could not be done under the bill before you, concerning, as it does, only matters of trade. Such a proposal should be considered by the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Next came those who think there should be a loan to Finland; that it should be made specifying Finland; that part of any additional funds to be lent by the Export-Import Bank should be designated as going to Finland. Against that is the consideration that we would be drawing a line between Finland and other countries who need funds just as much. We have already lent or committed ourselves for a loan to China of $25,000,000, and it has asked for more. Certainly it would be grossly unfair to specify that we would lend to Finland and not say that we would lend to China. Sympathy for China is just as well-founded as that for Finland, and its need for help has continued now through more than 2 years without our recognizing it by a loan specified in any law.

Next may come occasion for loans to Norway and Sweden, to Denmark, Holland, Belgium, countries adjacent to Germany, and then to Rumania, Bulgaria, Turkey, and the Balkan States, within easy reach of Russia, and all the other countries threatened by the gigantic catastrophe of world-wide war.

If we were to proceed as the bill proposes—and we have now reached the dividing line between opinions—we rely upon the assurance of Mr. Jesse Jones that he expects to lend to Finland $10,000,000 more at once, and then still another $10,000,000 if warranted by the situation. Some gentlemen will say that Mr. Jones ought not to be trusted to exercise that authority. He is, in my judgment, the most capable man in the Government. He has administered a nonpartisan measure, conceived by Republicans, put into further execution by Democrats, which has been the most successful of all our new administrative agencies, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

I recall having attended a conference at the White House in October of 1931, the most serious, the most solemn gathering it was ever my fortune to attend. There were present members of the legislative committees that would consider the proposals to be made; also the Secretary of the Treasury, the Vice President, all the men who were directly concerned, of both parties, to hear what the President had to say. Mr. Hoover told us that every bank in this country would close its doors inside of a fortnight if fear were not allayed by our promise to do four things, and we gave him that promise. Every Democrat and every Republican present joined in that promise. One of those things was the creation of what became the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the most successful of all our administrative agencies, and most successful because wisely administered at the start by Republicans, and of late years by Jesse Jones. [Applause.]

It will be proposed here today that we ought to decide explicitly whether to lend money to Finland. Mr. Jones told us he had already lent to Finland $10,000,000. I am wrong in saying "lent to Finland." I am using a term that I criticize soundly for being used by the press and by Members of this House in speaking of this as a Finnish bill. It is not a Finnish bill. It is a bill for China. It is a bill for Norway, which already has made application; it is a bill for Sweden, which has made application for far more than can be granted. It is a bill for any country that desires to buy goods in the United States. It is the foreign-trade law; the existing law, which does not discriminate, and should not discriminate, against any country on the earth that can qualify.

Calling it, then, a trading measure, we are told that we ought to specify in this legislation one country and omit all other countries. Surely that is unwise. Surely it is dangerous. Surely it invites belief on the part of the countries who are not favored, that the Congress of the United States has taken sides in this tragic quarrel. Taking sides means violating neutrality. If you pass these amendments today, it will be the first step toward war. Every man here can recall what happened in 1915 and 1916 when we were professing neutrality, when we were saying we would never go to war, when we were denouncing war, when we were electing a President on his pledge to keep us out of war. Within 6 months of his election we were in war. Every reasonable man here knows that every step we take toward war brings it nearer, that we will take other steps, that having favored one country we will favor another country until we make the fatal mistake of embroiling ourselves in this contest that threatens to destroy the civilization of Europe.

Let us keep out of this war. Let us remember that every such step we take, whatever it may be, every step is a step toward brutally ending the lives of possibly a million or more of our boys, the destruction of our property, perhaps the destruction of our form of government, all brought about through a course of affairs that so closely matches what went on in 1915 and 1916 that we again find history repeating itself, human nature ever the same, men at last yielding to their emotions, to their sentiments, to their passions, and risking all they have on one cast of the die. This is why I believe we ought to be cautious today, why we ought to take the middle ground. We ought not to do that to which I have referred.

We ought not to go to the other extreme, we ought not to dispense entirely with our opportunity to serve.

And here I would answer my good friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] in his declaration that we ought to keep out of all this sort of thing, that it is an extension of powers beyond the scope of the Constitution and beyond the needs of the moment. Sir, I have already said that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, a lending agency of the Government, has been the most effective of all the agencies devised for meeting the conditions of the depression from which we suffer. We have in that agency not only the precedent, we have there in its success the justification, we have there the showing for the necessity of some degree of centralized action and control.

We cannot meet the situation piecemeal, we cannot face it by State action. I yield to no man in objection to concentrating in Washington the powers that can and should be exercised by the States, but, sir, this is a power of the Nation to be used for the welfare of the Nation, that could not be used by the individual States or by any subdivision thereof. In this Chamber we the representatives of the people of the United States must act for the Nation. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri desire to be heard on the pending amendment?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Not at this time, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey has offered an amendment to the amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KEAN to the committee amendment: On page 2, line 5, after the word "government" insert "which is in default in the payment of its obligations or any part thereof to any citizens of the United States, or."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment provides that the Export-Import Bank shall not lend any money to any country which is in default to any citizen of the United States.

This amendment will apply chiefly to the South American countries which are 77 percent in default today. Mr. Chairman, I believe in being a good neighbor, but being a good neighbor does not mean that you have to be a sucker. If you are a good neighbor, you must have the respect of the people of the countries with which you are neighborly, and the people of South America today just think that we are fools. I want to read into the proceedings on this bill the record of some of the South American countries showing how they have handled their obligations to the citizens of the United States:

Countries	Total
	Outstanding	In default
Argentina	$233,000,000	$20,000,000
Bolivia	60,000,000	60,000,000
Brazil	356,000,000	356,000,000
Chile	182,000,000	182,000,000
Colombia	146,000,000	143,000,000
Costa Rica	8,000,000	8,000,000
Dominican Republic	15,000,000
Ecuador	12,000,000	12,000,000
El Salvador	12,000,000	12,000,000
Guatemala	5,000,000	3,000,000
Haiti	8,000,000	8,000,000
Mexico	273,000,000	273,000,000
Panama	17,000,000	17,000,000
Peru	85,000,000	85,000,000
Uruguay	56,000,000	5,600,000

It will be said that this amendment is for the purpose of aiding the wicked Wall Street bankers; but you know as well as I that the bankers who bought these bonds sold them to the public. The bankers themselves do not hold any of the bonds now. None of the 26 big insurance companies which control most of the insurance in this country hold these bonds. None of the 100 biggest banks in the metropolitan areas hold these bonds. They have investment committees that study past records, and they knew that these South American bonds were not secure. I remember back about 15 years ago looking in the Encyclopedia Britannica when somebody asked me whether Colombia was a good investment, and under Finance, it stated in this encyclopedia that the chief record of Colombia in finance was one of defaults.

Where are these bonds held? They are scattered widely throughout the country, held by widows who, needing a little more income, were attracted by the 7-percent yield. They are held by small country banks; they are held by little-business men throughout the country who put their small surplus into these bonds.

As a rule, these countries have not defaulted because of inability to pay, but just because they do not want to. In the case of Colombia, for instance, their favorable balance of trade over the past 8 years has been four times the interest requirements on their external debt during that period.

Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will be adopted that the Congress may show that it has not forgotten these people in their troubles.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, under the proposed amendment, presuming it is the same one the gentleman offered in the committee, if anyone in Finland should owe anyone in the United States and is in default, no loan could be made to Finland. This is a very far-reaching amendment and should be defeated. I am using Finland as an illustration. It would apply in the same way to other countries.

FARM RELIEF

There is no reason why we should convert this bill into a debt-collecting law, and it is not a bill for the purpose of collecting debts. This bill should be known as a farm-relief measure. It will help the farmer because it will make it possible for credit to be extended to people in other countries who will purchase surplus farm commodities in this country. It will also aid the manufacturers who have surplus goods to sell and who cannot sell them because credit is not available. This bill is for the purpose of aiding in the export of surplus farm commodities and surplus manufactured goods.

During the last week or two our genial and able chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Alabama, the Honorable HENRY STEAGALL, has not been well. During his absence, the next in order of rank has been serving as acting chairman, the gentleman from Missouri, the Honorable CLYDE WILLIAMS, and I want to now commend the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WILLIAMS] for the splendid and fair way that he has handled this bill, both in the committee and in the House.

KEEP IT A NEUTRAL BILL

I hope it remains a bill for the purpose of exporting surplus commodities, farm products, and manufactured goods. If we keep it this way it will be a neutral bill. If we change it, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] suggested yesterday, by directing or authorizing the Export-Import Bank to make a loan of a certain amount of money, $20,000,000, to Finland, and take off any restriction whatsoever, and by law say that the loan shall be made for the purpose of permitting Finland to purchase arms, ammunition, and implements of war, we immediately take sides to the extent that we are furnishing one side of a war with arms, ammunition, and implements of war. We would be passing an unneutral bill. As to whether or not we should do that I shall not discuss here because I am not prepared to discuss it at this time and the Members of the House, I venture to say, are not in position to pass upon that great question.

We have not had any hearings on whether or not we should become involved in a war. That is a great big question. If you pass the Gifford amendment or authorize loans to be made to a country involved in war to enable that country specifically to purchase arms, ammunition, and implements of war in this country you are immediately becoming involved in that war. Possibly we will become involved, although I certainly hope we will not. Possibly it is right that we should, but I hope that will never be. If we do, let us do it deliberately and directly after full, clear, and deliberate consideration and after we have had testimony from all the people who should be heard and who can give us information that will enable us to pass upon that serious question.

KEEP WAR QUESTION OUT OF THIS BILL

Mr. Chairman, I hope the committee votes down the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], because it is not a reasonable amendment. It gets us into the debt-collecting business. If the gentleman's amendment should prevail many corporations and individuals would be able to collect foreign bonds, 100 cents on the dollar, with interest, when they paid only a few cents on the dollar for them. I am not willing to use an act of Congress for that purpose.

I hope we will keep this an export bill and keep all Finnish questions or war questions out of it. Let us have the courage at the proper time to approach the question directly and not incidentally.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I shall speak in favor of the pending amendment, because I intended to offer one very similar to that which the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] has offered. If I understood the gentleman from Texas correctly, he made application of this amendment to individual citizens of Finland, which does not hold true under the amendment offered, because it refers to governments, not to their nationals, and I think that should be clearly understood by those who are now on the floor.

Mr. Chairman, this is a bill having to do with the Export-Import Bank and not the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. I am opposed to the bill as it comes to the House in its present form. We should keep in mind that these loans are to be made to western European countries and to Latin American countries. If you want to get an idea of what is going on in Latin America, keep in mind that there are about 123,000,000 people in those countries to the south of us as against approximately 11,000,000 people in Canada.

FINANCING THE PRODIGAL

The Roosevelt administration has repeatedly favored the making of loans by governmental agencies to Latin American countries. The Export-Import Bank already has made a number of such loans. Credits for currency stabilization and other purposes by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Exchange Stabilization Fund have been discussed in official circles time and again. The new Inter-American Bank is expected to fill the gap so that defaulting countries like Mexico can borrow.

The American public is not fully aware of the implications of such a policy of Government loans to Latin America. It has been lulled into a false sense of confidence that the lending of Government money is a desirable way, as in the cases of Finland and China, and also that it is a way to expand our export trade. The public has been misled into believing that it is better for the Government to make such loans than for private investors to buy bonds that are likely to go into default subsequently.

What the American public has not been told clearly is that the true alternative is not between Government loans and the sale of bonds to private investors, but rather between Government loans and the direct investment of capital by American enterprise in Latin American countries. If private capital, as in the case of Mexico, is unsafe, how can public funds be any better secured? The sale of Latin American Government bonds to private investors in this country is unlikely to assume important proportions for a long time to come. Can any justification be shown for public loans?

Whatever we think about domestic pump priming, we must recognize that indiscriminate international pump priming does much more harm than good. It has a misguiding effect upon the countries that are supposed to be benefited. This is true since it causes governments like Mexico and Bolivia to conclude mistakenly that they do not need to treat private American investments fairly and equitably. That is a disease no one should help spread. The spectacle of the United States Government, directly, or through its agencies as the Export-Import Bank, making loans to countries that have not been scrupulous about the way in which they have treated American rights and property encourages the adoption of confiscatory policies generally. And if these are adopted generally international anarchy will result and national law and order will be threatened.

Mexico is an example. That country has been encouraged to go her communistic way, seizing American property without payment. She has taken the railroads, oil properties, farm and ranch lands, and mines developed by American enterprise and capital, because she has been substantially financed by an indirect method of international pump priming emanating out of Washington through silver purchases. But Mexico no longer benefits from that rich flow of American capital into direct investments. Nor does Mexico longer enjoy the cooperation of American enterprise which has done so much to develop her resources. Nevertheless, she has been led to think that she can make up for the loss of such capital by inducing the United States to buy her silver production at a fictitious price set by our Treasury. Now, Mexico proposes to borrow money from United States Government agencies, and if this fails then to aid in creating an Inter-American Bank from which to borrow—and not pay.

But pump priming through silver purchases and paltry loans can never take the place of large-scale private investments. Direct investments by American citizens in Mexico alone have aggregated almost a billion dollars. It is entirely misleading to think of American direct investments in Latin America merely in terms of dollars and cents. Even more important are the technology, the initiative, the skill, and the managerial ability that a country imports, along with capital, when it receives foreign investments in its enterprises and resources.

When an American company invests money in producing, refining, or marketing facilities, for example, it makes available in connection with this investment, its skilled organization, its wealth of practical experience and knowledge in the industry, and the guidance of its management. It creates jobs, increases wages, raises the standard of living, and creates a great body of skilled workmen out of day laborers. How can Government loans which largely provide trade credits or for nonproductive Government construction possibly take the place of direct investments under such conditions?

The outstanding example of what private capital can accomplish is furnished by Canada. That country has received almost $7,000,000,000 of direct investments from abroad. As a result, her standard of living is one of the highest in the world. The great investments made by the United States in Canada, furthermore, have brought us a rich return in the shape of our huge trade with her.

In fact, no better illustration could be found of the theory that foreign trade follows foreign investments than in the trade relations of the United States with Canada. American direct investments in Canada today are estimated at about $1,700,000,000, and although Canada has a comparatively small population of 11,000,000 people, she comes second only to Great Britain in the purchase of manufactured American goods. Canada has not been exploited by these foreign investments. On the contrary, she has maintained her independence and at the same time has prospered as have none of those nations which discourage or hamstring foreign investments, which were made for the purpose of helping convert their natural resources to productive use.

One other interesting point is that our trade with Canada as well as our investments in Canada are both large. It also is interesting to note that by contrast Latin America, with 123,000,000 people, takes but little more of United States exports than does Canada with only 11,000,000 people. Commerce Department figures show that in 1938 we shipped 18.2 percent of our export products to Latin America and 15.1 percent to Canada in that same year. These figures are all the more revealing when compared on a per capita basis. They show, for example, that for every dollar's worth of goods sold by the United States to Latin Americans $10 worth are sold to Canadians, despite the fact that the total amount of American direct investments in Latin America taken as a whole are two times greater than are American investments in Canada.

It seems clear to us that the development of natural resources, the building of railways, and factories, and public utilities, and other kinds of productive enterprises will benefit greatly the countries in which the investments are made. This is inevitably true because such investments create new productive wealth; new productive wealth in turn creates and stimulates trade. Government loans whether direct or indirect will not do this.

I could go a step further on this. Mr. Jones, Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, in testifying in connection with the Export-Import Bank capital, made the statement:

I do not think we would ever need more than $125,000,000.

That is in House hearings on H. R. 2011 and H. R. 4012. Why do they need additional capital? Because they have shifted the purpose of the Export-Import Bank and they are now making foreign-policy loans. What do I mean by foreign-policy loans? I mean loans such as made to China which indicated by making the loan to China that we hold Japan as the aggressor. Why did we make the loans to Brazil? To shake loose the Brazilian currency. Let me quote something in reference to Brazilian exchange. Mr. Eugene P. Thomas, president of the National Foreign Trade Council, stated:

With the favorable balance of trade of only about $15,000,000 in 1938, it became necessary for Brazil to delay for periods ranging from 2 months to 6 months the dollar remittances to American exporters and of earnings for a considerably longer period.

Thus we can see the loans were made to help Brazil directly. Are we to bail them out every time they have difficulty in obtaining foreign exchange? Just how far are we going with this Export-Import Bank in the way of making policy loans? Just 4 months ago, Congress decided that $100,000,000 was sufficient for its capital. This was done for many obvious reasons. In the first place, the need for the bank is diminishing. There is a huge excess of credit in existing channels and private banking firms have shown increased interest in the types of loans made by the bank. This is shown by the fact that an increasing number of loans authorized by the Export-Import Bank were not used, because the exporters were able to obtain private credit. In the second place, Congress had no desire to overextend the credit of the United States Government in foreign transactions. Bitter experience in the World War dictated this course. In the third place, $100,000,000 was considered to be the maximum amount which could profitably be used by the bank toward promoting recovery. We are shadow-boxing here. These loans are not being made primarily for the purpose of exporting agricultural surpluses. I do not fall for any such piffle. There is a bigger motive behind this. If you will read my remarks of yesterday afternoon and study the evidence I put into the RECORD, you will find more in connection with this so-called Latin American shift.

The nature of the loans now being negotiated would indicate that the President desires to alter the intent of Congress by forcing the Export-Import Bank to make foreign-policy loans. I again refer to our reason for making the Chinese loan. And how about the Brazilian loan, where we feared Nazi penetration? Is the bank now to be made a very important arm of our Government and is it to be used for the purpose of a back-door foreign-policy-making agency of government? Doubling the capital structure of the bank does not, in my judgment, increase the welfare of our people or materially add to recovery in the United States. We have no further right to tax our people to carry on such operations. We have before us the experience of our World War foreign-policy loans.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of this amendment and hope it will be supported. [Applause.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] to the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KEAN) there were—ayes 86, noes 135.

So the amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KEEFE to the committee amendment: On page 2, line 5, after the word "Government", insert the words "or any agencies or nationals thereof."

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, the proviso beginning in line 4 of page 2 of the pending bill is apparently an attempt to restrict the operation of the so-called Johnson Act. The Johnson Act in section 2 specifically exempts from its provisions an institution or organization such as the Export-Import Bank. If I understand this committee amendment correctly, it is for the purpose of restricting the activities of the Export-Import Bank so that under this present situation it cannot loan money to those governments that are in default on their loans, and thus constitutes an amendment to the Johnson Act to that extent.

I wish to direct your attention to the fact that in line 7 of this bill appears the first proviso, which states:

Provided further, That the aggregate amount of loans to any one foreign country and the agencies and nationals thereof * * * shall not exceed $20,000,000.

It is apparent that as to that provision there was an attempt to restrict the amount of the loans that could be made to any foreign country and the agencies and nationals thereof. I have wondered why this same language has not appeared in the second proviso, which is an attempt to limit the authority of the Export-Import Bank. The fact is that it is perfectly clear that without including the words I have provided in my amendment, namely, "the agencies and nationals thereof," the Export-Import Bank could make a loan to an agency of any country set up in this country just exactly as has been made to Finland and China through the medium of agencies already set up here. Such a loan would not be one to the Government of Finland or to the Government of China or to the Government of England or the Government of France. It would be a loan to an independent corporation established here by those governments. Therefore, it seems to me, the restriction that is attempted to be provided in this proviso is not effective.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me? I am a member of the committee.

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentlewoman from Illinois.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. I am very pleased the gentleman has offered this amendment. As far as I can see from the evidence given in the hearings there is not one single loan that would be affected by the committee amendment without the addition of the amendment offered by the gentleman.

Mr. KEEFE. I thank the gentlewoman.

If you will look at page 13 of the hearings you will see that Jesse Jones describes the manner of making these loans. For instance, in connection with the $10,000,000 loan to Finland a Finnish corporation was established, and in the case of the loan to China the Universal Trading Corporation was set up. These are corporations formed in this country. The loan is not made to the Government of Finland or to the Government of China but to these trading companies, and the loan is guaranteed by the Government of Finland in one case and the Bank of China in the other case.

I should like to ask this committee whether, if this bill passes in its present form, there is anything to prevent England from forming a trading corporation in this country and the Export-Import Bank making a loan to that corporation; and would not the same thing be true in the case of France? I have offered this amendment for the purpose of using exactly the same language in the second proviso that is found in the first one, and to make it clear that the intent of the Congress is that the Government of the United States through the medium of the Export-Import Bank shall make no loans either direct to a government or to any agency established by a government that is in default to this country on its loans. I should like to ask the acting chairman of the committee if he would be kind enough to answer my question at this time.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I did not understand the question.

Mr. KEEFE. The question is, If this bill passes in its present form, cannot the Government of England establish an agency in this country just as Finland did and just as China did, and the Export-Import Bank thus indirectly make a loan to a government that is in default, a loan which the Johnson Act would prohibit, perhaps, directly?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. I may say to the gentleman there is only one loan on record that is anyway near a loan to a government, and that is the loan to Finland. In that case the Finnish Government guarantees the loan. The loan itself is not made to the Finnish Government.

Mr. KEEFE. I understand that.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. But in that case, I would say that the loan could not be made where the ultimate responsibility for the payment of it was on the Government, under the language of the act as it is.

Mr. KEEFE. The justification for the loan to China when the loan was guaranteed by the Bank of China was that the Chinese Government was the Bank of China.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 5 additional minutes in order that we may have more discussion on this very important question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. MICHENER and Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin rose.

Mr. KEEFE. I will yield in just a moment.

In answer to the question of the gentleman, may I say that the justification of the loan to the Universal Trading Corporation was that that corporation obligation was guaranteed by the Bank of China.

The justification for the Bank of China guaranteeing the loan was that the stock in the Bank of China was largely owned by the Chinese Government. Therefore the justification of the loan itself was that the Chinese Government was behind it.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MICHENER. Answering the question directly, which the gentleman asked of the acting chairman of the committee, it was stated before the Rules Committee the other day by the acting chairman of the committee, as I remember, that when the Export-Import Bank was set up in the first instance, the express purpose was to be able to loan to Russia at that time and thus get around the Johnson Act. It seems to me that is a square answer to the question.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. The gentleman from Michigan is certainly mistaken about what I said and about what the fact is. It is true that the Johnson Act does not cover the Export-Import Bank, but the Export-Import Bank was set up and in existence at the time the Johnson Act was passed.

Mr. KEEFE. Now, I would like a direct answer by the chairman of the committe to my question, which has not as yet been answered. Let me ask it again. Under the provisions of this law as it now stands, whether you have made a loan heretofore or not, is it not legally possible, if this bill passes in its present form, that the Governments of England and France can set up a trading corporation in this country and that the Export-Import Bank could then loan to that trading corporation, the stock of which may be owned by the Governments of England and France, and thus make indirectly a loan to those two governments that are in default on their previous loans, and accomplish indirectly what the Johnson Act specifically prohibits?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. I do not think so. I think the act, as amended, will cover the very situation the gentleman speaks of. The author of that amendment, perhaps, can answer better than I can, but that is not my interpretation of it. The Government itself cannot set up a corporation Government-owned and secure a loan. Of course, any kind of loan can be made to the nationals or, perhaps, some agency, but if it is a government agency, owned and operated by the government, I would say not.

Mr. KEEFE. Now, just a moment. The testimony very definitely shows on page 13, when Mr. Jones was testifying about this loan to Finland, that the Finnish Government itself guarantees that loan or guarantees the loan of this Finnish trading corporation, which is established as a local corporation in the United States, so that it is, in effect, so far as the guaranty of the loan is concerned, a loan to the Finnish Government.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. That is all right, but the Finnish Government is not in default.

Mr. KEEFE. But the same thing is true as to China, and I am asking you whether the same thing is not possible under this law.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. China is not in default either, but in my opinion the Chinese loan—and I think this is the opinion of the Administrator—is not a loan to the government.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Soviet Russia is in default almost $1,000,000,000, and without the gentleman's amendment the Amtorg Trading Corporation could obtain loans from our almost bankrupt Federal Treasury through the Export-Import Bank to purchase war supplies, munitions, and implements of war.

Mr. KEEFE. That is exactly the situation I have in mind in offering this amendment—to prohibit by indirection a thing which cannot be done directly.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. Is not an answer to the gentleman's question the fact that this is a mere resolution that makes no attempt to repeal the Johnson Act, which applies only to debtor nations that owe us and refuse to pay us?

Mr. KEEFE. I do not know what the gentleman means when he says it is "a mere resolution" and does not mean anything.

Mr. MAY. It does not repeal the Johnson Act.

Mr. KEEFE. The fact is that this is an attempt on the part of the Congress, in the second proviso, to place a restriction upon the activities of the Export-Import Bank under the Johnson law.

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEEFE. I yield.

Mr. BARRY. I believe the gentleman's amendment would only increase or extend the committee amendment; and the question the gentleman asked of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WILLIAMS], I think, brings up the question of principal and agent, and if by subterfuge the Government establishes such an agency, all we have to do is to determine that fact. In my opinion, all the gentleman's amendment does is to extend the amendment to the nationals of a country. Does the gentleman want the provision to apply to every individual businessman?

Mr. KEEFE. Why do you use the limitation in the preceding proviso?

Mr. BARRY. I had nothing to do with that.

Mr. KEEFE. That is just the point. Somebody has something to do with one thing and somebody has something to do with another; and I am here as a Member of Congress compelled to vote on this matter, and I am seeking information that will be intelligent, and I have not been able to get it yet.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, I arise in opposition to the amendment. I am sure the gentleman's amendment goes a good deal further than he intends it to go. For instance, as it reads, the Export-Import Bank of Washington shall not make any loans to any government or nationals or agencies thereof which was in default. There is a wide difference between a government and an agency of a government. For instance, would you consider the Federal Reserve bank an agency of the Federal Government? Would you consider the Bank of Brazil an agency of the Brazilian Government?

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORE. Not now. It has been said that a loan made to a government which was in default is as good as a loan made to an agency thereof. There is a wide difference. A government can default, and continue to be a nation and continue to be a people, but the Bank of Brazil, for instance, can default only by closing its doors. By the language of the proposed amendment you could not make a loan to a national, a person, a corporation, or an agency in any country which is in default. I do not believe the gentleman wants to go that far.

Let me point out the operation of the bank as it relates to South America. Of the $120,000,000 loaned by the bank, $65,000,000 have been to Latin American trade. Last year 62 percent of the commitments of the bank were to South America, and mind you, not a single default has been made in any loans, and not one is behind the schedule in payment. The war in Europe and the conflict in the Orient increases the importance of the South American trade. Bids which were originally awarded to European manufacturers have been canceled and American manufacturers are getting those bids, and they are looking to this bank for encouragement and assistance to make the loans in order to meet the requirements of long-term amortization. During the last 4 months of 1939 there was a 42-percent increase in our shipments to South America. I concur in the gentleman's hope that a loan will not be made to a government which is in default, and such a loan cannot be made under the terms of this bill, but I cannot go to the extent of shutting off the benefits of this bank to American manufacturers and exporters, farmers, and laborers.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORE. Yes.

Mr. KEEFE. I think the gentleman has an entire misconception of the situation.

Mr. GORE. I might say that that is a matter of opinion.

Mr. KEEFE. Oh, no; I think the gentleman will concede the situation when he understand the facts. This amendment does not touch South America at all, because the fact is, as I understand it, that the South American governments are in default on a lot of bonds, but not in default on direct loans made by this Government to South America. Consequently this amendment does not touch South America and refers only to those governments of Europe who took from this country during the World War direct loans out of the Treasury of the United States. It does not refer to South American countries at all.

Mr. GORE. The gentleman is correct insofar as to present application to South America is concerned, but a goodly portion of the world would be excluded by the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORE. Yes.

Mr. BARRY. The only countries affected by this are Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Estonia, France, Germany, Great Britain, Greece, Hungary, Italy, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Rumania, the Soviet Union, and Yugoslavia.

Mr. GORE. The gentleman is correct, and I thank him. The gentleman from Wisconsin does not contend that the operation of the act will be always just as it is now? He does not contend that the obligations of other governments will remain just as they are now?

Is it an indication that a British textile manufacturer would not meet his obligations on a purchase of American cotton because his Government is in default on a World War loan? Must the Export Bank be restricted and prevented from assisting exports of American products to this large portion of the world? Can it be said that no person or company in all these countries, or countries which may come within the purview of the amendment, is eligible for credit? Would the gentleman deprive the American farmer, manufacturer, laborer, and exporter to these vast markets of the benefits of the Export-Import Bank?

Mr. KEEFE rose.

Mr. GORE. I decline to yield further. The gentleman's purpose is no doubt good, but the effect of his amendment is contrary to the interests of our Nation, and I hope it will be defeated.

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. The purpose of the committee amendment is merely to make the terms of the Johnson Act apply to the authorization under this bill. In other words, to the countries I just mentioned when I interrupted the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GORE]. Not one of them is in Latin America. It was discovered during the hearings by some Members that the Johnson Act specifically exempted corporations in which the Government had a controlling stock interest.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARRY. Yes.

Mr. GORE. Under the provisions of the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin, could an agency of Great Britain, no matter how sound its record of financial transactions might be, borrow any money from the Export-Import Bank for the purchase of American cotton or any other farm products?

Mr. BARRY. It could not under the terms of the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SHANLEY. Does the gentleman mean that—under the provisions of the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. BARRY. Not under my amendment, but under the provisions of the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE], you cannot make a loan to any national of any of the countries or any of the countries affected by the Johnson Act.

Mr. SHANLEY. That is all right.

Mr. BARRY. I believe that in those countries, nationals, businessmen, who have no connection with the government whatever, might want to conduct an export-import trade with this country. Their business establishments may be sound, and it might be to the welfare of this country to exchange commodities with them as individuals. I do, however, accept that part of the gentleman's amendment which specifies any subdivision or agency of a government.

Mr. KEEFE. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. BARRY. I yield.

Mr. KEEFE. It is a fact, is it not, that in drafting this amendment to the pending resolution you had in mind placing a restriction upon the Johnson Act?

Mr. BARRY. Placing a restriction on the Export-Import Bank.

Mr. KEEFE. Under the Johnson Act?

Mr. BARRY. Yes; and the reason for that is because I think there is a tendency to make the Export-Import Bank an arm of our foreign policy on the part of some people. Let me tell you this: Jesse Jones testified that he never made such a loan and never would, but my fear is that Jesse Jones may not always be head of the Export-Import Bank.

Mr. KEEFE. That is exactly the situation. Now, will the gentleman answer this: If this resolution passes in its present form, England could set up a buying agency in this country, could she not?

Mr. BARRY. I do not believe that is true. I believe that such an act would be a subterfuge and it would be merely establishing an agency, and the principal is responsible for his agent.

Mr. KEEFE. Why do you call it a subterfuge when, under the Johnson Act, the Export-Import Bank is specifically exempted, and were it not for the adoption of this proviso, the Export-Import Bank could make loans to England now?

Mr. BARRY. That is right.

Mr. KEEFE. There would not be any subterfuge about it.

Mr. BARRY. My only complaint with the gentleman's amendment is that it is too embracing. It takes in individual businessmen who have no connection with governments of countries affected by the Johnson Act.

Mr. KEEFE. Would the gentleman be satisfied with the amendment provided we struck out the word "nationals" and left it so that it included agencies?

Mr. BARRY. Yes; I would be perfectly satisfied with it. However, I am only speaking as an individual and not for the committee.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARRY. I yield.

Mr. KEAN. I believe the Neutrality Act covers this matter entirely. Section 7 of the Neutrality Act says:

That when a proclamation has been issued no money may be loaned to any such government, political subdivision, or person.

I think that covers it completely.

Mr. BARRY. The Neutrality Act does not apply to all countries affected by the Johnson Act.

Mr. SHANLEY. Will the gentleman look at the definition of "person" in the definitions, section 16 of the Neutrality Act?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlewoman from Illinois is recognized for 5 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that in the amendment under consideration the word "nationals" may be stricken from the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, may we have the amendment read as amended?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment as amended by the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, we want it read as it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment as is.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the committee amendment offered by Mr. KEEFE: Page 2, line 5, after the word "government", insert "or any agencies or nationals thereof."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to withdraw from the amendment the word "nationals." Is there objection?

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

The lady from Illinois is recognized for 5 minutes.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the question is whether you want the Johnson Act, which has been passed by this Congress, to apply to the Export-Import Bank. That is the only question, because the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. KEEFE] has stated that his amendment is phrased in the exact phraseology of the Johnson Act.

As has been pointed out, there have been no loans made by the Export-Import Bank to foreign governments. All loans have been made to agencies of foreign governments. You will find from examination of the testimony that the Export-Import Bank can loan money to England or any other country in default to the United States, through its agencies in this country. It is deterred only by the word of Mr. Jesse Jones, the head of the lending department, and his policy.

Mr. Jesse Jones may not live forever. I dislike to see the able men of this Congress depending too much upon the discretion of one single man. As you know, I am an old maid. I do not have anything against any man. [Laughter and applause.] Mr. Jesse Jones is an able administrator, but my objection to this bill is that while we did have short consideration of the proposition to extend the capital of the Export-Import Bank in the spring, the whole situation has been changed since then by the war. This bill, which doubles the capital of that great bank, was only considered for 2 or 3 short days, and all of the talk was about Finland.

Now, with regard to this amendment; is it not just another reiteration of this Johnson policy that the able gentleman from Wisconsin wishes to defend, wishes to perpetuate and apply to all the departments and agencies of our Government?

Why is it that you are here today befriending Finland? Is it not because our country gave its men and money for the benefit of other nations when they were in need? Then, alas, we needed bill collectors. America needed that some reminder be given to other nations of the world that honor among nations should exist; that debts owed to the people of the United States should be paid. Again and again little Finland stepped up and rang the cash register in a way that was heard around the world. This is the only reason that you feel that you owe her anything, because she served the welfare of the United States. If Finland should cease to exist, we have nothing left but the Johnson Act to remind the people of the world that they cannot mistreat our people; that they should have enough honor to repay their obligations to America. For this reason I believe this is a very important amendment. I think we should remind the peoples of the world again and again that they should honor themselves by honoring their obligations to the people of America.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman from Illinois yield for a question?

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Can the gentlewoman inform the Committee how many Members appeared on this bill before the Committee on Banking and Currency?

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. We had Mr. Hackworth, representing the State Department, advising concerning neutrality. We had Mr. Jones. I recall no other witness except the one witness who appeared on the subject of commercial as opposed to military airplanes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. And he spoke only about 5 minutes.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. This is a duplication of the spend-lend bill, where nobody appeared except Government administrators and represententatives of Government bureaus. We are writing the policies of the Government of the United States with only bureau heads and administrators appearing.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. If the gentleman will recall, there were only 20 pages of testimony in the hearings on the spend-lend bill, and I believe the hearings took only a part of one afternoon. The only witness was Mr. Jesse Jones, that able witness, if I am any judge of witnesses, who can twist Congressmen around his finger just like that [indicating]. [Applause and laughter.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SPENCE].

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, the Johnson Act expressly excluded governmental agencies from its provisions, and I think there was a very definite reason for this exclusion. At the time the Johnson Act was passed the people of the United States were being flooded with spurious, worthless securities of foreign governments. They had no knowledge of the worthlessness of those securities. They were subject to the imposition and fraud of the salesmen who attempted to sell these securities to the unsuspecting people of the United States.

In the Johnson Act an exemption was made of agencies of the Government. As used in the Johnson Act the term "person" includes individual, partnership, corporation, or association other than a public corporation created pursuant to the special authorization of Congress, or a corporation in which the Government of the United States has or exercises a controlling interest through stock ownership or otherwise. The presumption was clear that the agencies of the United States would conform to the foreign policy of the United States. The presumption was clear that the agencies of the United States knew the character of the foreign securities that were being floated in this country and knew the character of the foreign securities it might purchase; and, therefore, the agencies of the United States were exempted from the provisions of this act. I believe you will discover that if you will read the report of the committee that reported that bill.

In the report of the committee it is assigned as one of the reasons for the adoption of this provision that it was to stop the floating of the spurious, worthless securities to the people of the United States who had no knowledge of their worthlessness. Now, to carry out that very assumption, that the agencies of the United States will conform to the foreign policy of the United States, I may cite the testimony of Mr. Jones. Mr. Jones said in the administration of the affairs of the Export-Import Bank that he would conform to the Johnson Act; that he would conform to international law; that he would conform to the neutrality declaration of the President of the United States; and that he would carry out what he thought were the wishes of the Government of the United States. If we give to this agency that credit the original drafters of the Johnson Act gave them, there is no reason to have any amendment in the bill, and it is my impression that any amendment but ties the hands of these administrators of this great agency of the United States. I did, however, vote for the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARRY], because I thought it would be harmless; but, as Mr. Jones said, he would conform to all of the requirements of international law and all of the policies adopted by the United States, it is entirely ineffectual.

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. Would not any other official in Mr. Jones' place do exactly the same thing?

Mr. SPENCE. Certainly. The agencies of the United States are going to carry out the policy of the United States; and it is safe to assume that we do not need any limitations or restrictions such as this around the conduct of this great agency.

Mr. KELLER. As a matter of fact, if a loan is made to an authorized agent, is it not made to the principal?

Mr. SPENCE. Absolutely, and they take that into consideration in making loans.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield.

Mr. CELLER. A number of loans are made to provinces and other political subdivisions of South American countries. Many such subdivisions or countries have already applied for loans to the Export-Import Bank. Would not the amendment have some effect, directly or indirectly, upon the application to these countries?

Mr. SPENCE. Absolutely.

Mr. CELLER. Loans which have already been authorized by the Export-Import Bank?

Mr. SPENCE. It would tie the hands and destroy the judgment of Jesse Jones and the board of directors of the Export-Import Bank. I believe this agency is in very safe hands, and we can rely on their judgments.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield.

Mr. GORE. If the amendment were adopted even with the word "nationals" stricken out, would there not be endless trouble in the interpretation of the word "agency"?

Mr. SPENCE. Of course, there would be, and it would tie the hands of one of the best administrators in the United States or anywhere else.

Mr. GORE. Is it not true that even though the Government owned a very small percent of the capital stock of a corporation within that country, it might be considered as an agency?

Mr. SPENCE. You cannot conceive of the ramifications of the doubts and the troubles that might arise from this amendment.

Mr. KEEFE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SPENCE. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KEEFE. You have the very same language in the first proviso.

Mr. SPENCE. Well, I was not very much in favor of that proviso when it was put in the bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to strike out the last four words.

Mr. Chairman, I was astonished at the attempt of the chairman of my committee to dodge the question asked by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER]. On page 27 of the hearings Jesse Jones stated that the present Export-Import Bank was organized to facilitate trade between this country and Russia at the time the Soviet Union was recognized. Let there be no mistake about that. Legislation has been enacted to get around the Johnson Act. Now, we are trying to remedy this, and include all nations in default to our Government. Perhaps they should be included.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. I certainly insist that the bank was organized first, and the Johnson Act was passed afterward.

Mr. GIFFORD. I read what Jesse Jones said.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. The bank was not organized to get around the Johnson Act.

Mr. GIFFORD. All right. We can each put our own interpretation on that.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. The act was passed undoubtedly to give the bank authority to carry on an export trade with Russia.

Mr. GIFFORD. Very well. I have read to you the authority for the first Export-Import Bank which was formed to facilitate trade with nations that could not otherwise make satisfactory exchanges. They made certain exchanges until they could later find money to settle the accounts.

Oh, times have changed. Read this bill. It simply says you cannot lend to nations which owe our Government money, but no matter how much such foreign governments may owe our nationals they are not excepted. You may have a pocketful of Government securities that were unloaded on you by these big houses in New York about which you complain so often, the so-called international bankers; yet you are loaded up with such securities, you are perfectly willing to let these countries borrow more. That is what the Keefe amendment is trying to remedy here. Some of you who have paper of that sort may sympathize with him. Mr. Jones said he would favor the Export-Import Bank lending Japan money, or to loan somebody here the money with which to buy scrap iron to send to Japan. That situation is not being remedied; it is a situation of cowardice. Questions of policy are creeping in, indeed. What is the plan here? To allow our people to sell their goods abroad and take whatever security they can get. Jesse Jones will lend the money. You sell the goods; they merely take your note, though they will also ask you what security you have. Is the Government endorsing the note? Is the Government actually the one that is to be ultimately responsible, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WILLIAMS] tells you?

I think the poor fellow who gave the original note, after exhausting his ability to get the money from the Government or bank in a foreign country would find that the Export-Import Bank would, as a last resort, take it away from our own national who made the original application. That is, if he has anything. There is too much confusion about this. It is beyond my power, perhaps, to make it plain, but someone should.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MICHENER. There may be one exception to the position I stated awhile ago and which has been confirmed by the gentleman from Massachusetts. That would be if the whole procedure was modified by the Neutrality Act, and where the President has found that a state of war exists. It might then be impossible to lend to any person, corporation, or association, but it would not prevent lending directly to Russia, for instance, because the President has not found that Russia is at war.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin to the committee amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. KEEFE) there were—ayes 69, noes 98.

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Mr. KEEFE and Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri to act as tellers.

The Committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 95 noes 128.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do not know what condition this bill will be in by the time it reaches a final vote, but I am extremely disturbed over its consequences.

Down in my old settlement once there lived an old Negro whose nose was as flat as if it had been run over by a steam roller. One day a white man said to him, "Uncle John, why do you suppose the Lord made your nose so flat?" Uncle John replied, "Captain, I don't know, less'n it was so I could keep it out'n other folks' business."

Mr. Chairman, I am afraid that we are not keeping our noses out of the other fellow's business. Every man in this House knows that I am anti-Communist, and I did not become that way because of the invasion of Finland. I became that way because of their insidious invasion of the United States and their traitorous attempts to overthrow my own Government.

Everybody who knows me, knows that I am in sympathy with bleeding Finland. I was in sympathy with bleeding Czechoslovakia. I was in sympathy with bleeding Poland, and with bleeding Manchukuo, and I am in sympathy with bleeding China. I was in sympathy with bleeding Ethiopia. But we cannot begin to send America's money, which ultimately means sending American men into every nook and corner of the world that is threatened with war or revolution. I am afraid that we are treading upon dangerous ground. Like the distinguished gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SHANLEY], I have promised the people I represent, every time they have ever elected me, that there were two things I would oppose. One of them was entangling alliances with foreign powers, and the other was getting mixed up in some other country's war.

Those are the dangers I see here, and today when our farmers are begging for farm parity prices, when we have millions of people out of work, when home owners are having their homes foreclosed and lands are being sold under the hammer, it is a serious proposition when you ask a Member of Congress to vote to extend credit which probably means entrance into a foreign war, when we should devote our energy toward protecting our own people and protecting our own shores.

I will vote for every dollar that is necessary to forever keep enemies off American soil. I am in sympathy with those individuals who are contributing to the cause of these people, and I sincerely trust that Finland may win this war, but I am not willing to take a step that I fear will plunge my country into another holocaust of destruction, probably costing millions of men and billions of dollars and losing what few friends we have abroad, and then having us called Shylocks again when it is over.

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. SOUTH. The gentleman knows that Finland did not regard us as a Shylock.

Mr. RANKIN. Finland did not; other nations we befriended did. Beside, if we get into war on behalf of Finland, it will probably spread, and we will have on our shoulders the burden of both the present European conflicts. Not only that, but if we were to get into war with a foreign power I seriously doubt if we would have a foreign friend come to our assistance. I seriously doubt if there is another country under the sun that would come to our assistance. America must look out for her own, and I am afraid that we are treading on dangerous ground by the passage of this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. I rise in support of this bill to make possible loans to Finland for certain necessary commodities. This bill was passed by the Senate and has been very carefully considered by the House Committee on Banking and Currency. I am sure that most of us will agree that the action of the Rules Committee in limiting debate was fully justified by the urgency of the situation. It is obvious that all possible haste must be exerted if this aid is to be effective in helping Finland's cause. The tide of battle does not wait upon unduly extended deliberations, nor does the ebb of life upon the arctic snows of Finland await the outcome of prolonged debate. This sister democracy is in her hour of desperate travail, and aid must come quickly if it is to come at all. Fighting alone against vastly overwhelming odds, this embattled little nation has long cried out for aid in the form of materials necessary to preserve life. Tomorrow may be too late, and if the world cannot spare to Finland the material assistance she needs today, I feel sure that this gallant little nation will wish to be spared tomorrow's ineffectual grief over her fate.

Some weeks ago the world was shocked and stunned by the spectacle of a vast and mighty nation marching in wanton and unprovoked aggression against its tiny neighbor. In the ensuing weeks the world was electrified by the miracle of self-sacrificing heroism that the people of Finland achieved. For the preservation of their faith in God, their culture, their ideals, and their national existence, the heroes of Finland have waged an epic struggle which will go down in history as one of the truly great struggles of mankind—a struggle of a free people against the forces of despotism, oppression, and atheism. Regardless of the eventual outcome, the world can never forget the great heroism and sacrifice of this heroic people.

I do not believe that there is any question as to where the sympathies of the American people lie in this one-sided struggle. The overwhelming preponderance of Americans hope and pray for the success of Finland in defending its existence against this lawless and unwarranted invasion. We in America, who cherish so dearly the priceless privileges of freedom and democracy, can well sympathize with the spirit that inspires this gallant defense of Finland. I feel sure that the people of America are anxious to extend to this little nation such aid as may be rendered without involvement.

Because of the lightning rapidity of events in Europe, the people of our Nation are somewhat confused and uncertain regarding the causes, aims, and objectives of the European war. In the light of the shifting pattern of military maneuver and power diplomacy, twisting and warping Europe into strange and unnatural designs, despite the welter of propaganda and counterpropaganda which has inundated our shores, I believe the determination of the American people to avoid participation in Europe's wars is greater than ever before. It is my belief that the peoples of the world are far from convinced that terrible and unrestricted warfare is yet inevitable and that they still hope against all hope that a program of lasting and enduring peace may be launched before the full hell and fury of unlimited carnage is unleashed upon the world.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that when the time comes to discuss peace—and I fervently pray that this time may come soon—the hope for a lasting adjustment of Europe's problems will rest in a sound recognition of the natural right of a people, united by common culture and development, to direct its own destinies. History will demonstrate that under a truly democratic system of government an autonomous people is best fitted to promote its own welfare and will do so along peaceful lines by the development of its own commerce, industry, science, and art. Such a people is best fitted to eliminate the seeds of distrust, intolerance, and jealousy which are the most prolific breeders of war. Given the right to control their own futures, peoples will not wish to resort to destructive wars, but will choose rather to promote their own internal development along the paths of peace, culture, and a broad sympathetic comity between nations.

The history and development of two grand little nations, Ireland and Finland, strikingly demonstrate the natural tendency of an autonomous people to develop an ideology based upon peace and tolerance and upon economic and social justice. Gaining autonomy at virtually the same time, the histories of these two countries have run closely parallel. In the short space of some 20 years of independent government, each of these nations has emerged from an undeveloped, backward country to a modern, enterprising, and progressive land. A brief glance at the history of each of these nations under independent government, will eloquently demonstrate the stabilizing influence toward peace of such autonomous peoples.

In some two decades of national existence, Finland has increased the arable area of the country by one-third and has increased the harvest by two-thirds. In a recent report on Finland, it is stated that—

> Industry has expanded at a rate almost unparalleled anywhere in the world. The value of industrial output has multiplied three and a half times over. New opportunities for work and new wealth have been created on a corresponding scale. * * * Hundreds of thousands of families formerly subsisting on leased land or casual work on the land have been helped to become farmers of their own soil, or have found steady income and every opportunity for a healthy life in the service of the expanding industries or of the new enterprises in the cities and industrial centers. Poverty and distress as widespread social phenomena have vanished.

Equally impressive, though not widely enough known, is the amazing development of Ireland under 20 years of independent and truly democratic rule. Under the British act of 1920, part of Ireland was granted a measure of independence which, in the ensuing years, ripened into the entirely autonomous nation of Eire. Up to the time of its freedom, Ireland was little more than a vast and undeveloped pasturage, a pleasant rural resort, utterly dependent upon the shifting and uncertain economies of other nations for its economic existence and with no independent internal economy worthy of the name. Since then, in the short space of 20 years, Ireland has gone far toward developing a sound national economy based upon development of its own resources and a program of sound economic relationships with other nations.

Where once manufacture was limited to a few homespuns, decentralized factories have sprung up all over Ireland, producing a host of diversified products which once were wholly imported. Ireland's agriculture has likewise been placed upon a sounder and vastly more productive basis. In this and many other ways, Ireland has approached its goal of a balanced national economy.

During this period, Ireland has also developed a new program of social development. It is contemplated by the government that $100,000,000 shall be spent on housing—a part of which has already been spent in this way. Nearly half a million is being spent for milk for poor children and a widows and orphans pension scheme is subsidized by the government.

The state is buying over about 100,000 acres of idle grazing lands and dividing this among landless men. Great progress has been made in education, and rural hospitals have been erected throughout Ireland. The Government has even promoted and fostered the arts and culture of the Nation.

Ireland has been handicapped and embarrassed in its development by the partition under the British act of 1920, which withheld from the new state six of the most fruitful counties of all Ireland. These counties bear a natural affiliation to the Irish Nation and, if left to their own devices without the constant rousing of prejudice, jealousy, and other disuniting emotions by external forces, would naturally gravitate to the new state. These counties could play a vital part in the economy of Eire and would contribute substantially to the development of a sound and self-sufficient economy for that Nation.

I believe that England could make a great contribution toward eventual peace in Europe at this time by permitting these counties, without obstruction and interference of any kind, to seek their natural affiliation with the rest of Ireland. By so doing she could demonstrate forcibly to the entire world her good faith toward small nations. This would go far toward dissipating the distrust and suspicion between the nations of Europe that exists today and would serve as an impetus toward the settlement of Europe's problems by negotiation and nonmilitary means.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that even this brief glance at the histories of these two contemporary nations will serve to demonstrate the importance toward eventual world peace on a sound and enduring basis of recognition of the right of a people, united by common culture and heritage, to control its own future. Finland and Ireland illustrate strikingly the tendency of such a people to solve its own problems by democratic methods and upon Christian principles of social justice. Both of these nations have sought to guide their destinies along the paths of peace and good will. Each has contributed a generous measure to the security of its own people and to the world's culture and ideology of peace. They have maintained their national honor without blemish and have set an inspiring example to the world. They deserve the sympathy and support of the world in their efforts to preserve and develop the great spiritual values which they have achieved.

Mr. Chairman, if Finland is destroyed, civilization will have lost a great battle in defense of right, justice, freedom, and religion; and the world will have lost a force toward peace. Despite the brilliant successes won by Finland, it is now apparent that the cost of these victories has sorely weakened the Finnish forces. Against the invader's constant replacements of fresh new forces, armed with the most modern of mechanized weapons, Finland can only pit her exhausted, decimated, inadequately equipped, and poorly supplied little Army. The huge Soviet losses have made no appreciable dent in her illimitable resources of manpower but the Finnish casualties have represented a serious loss to this little nation. The heroic defense of Finland shows signs of crumbling before the relentless onslaughts of the atheistic invaders, and the help furnished by the bill now before us is sorely needed by Finland. I do not believe that this bill will in any sense insure the success of Finland. However, it does represent something tangible—the only substantial step toward aiding this valiant little nation that has been presented to Congress. I hope that this House will lose no time in passing this measure in order that this aid may be available to Finland while it can still be of value. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Page 2, line 9, after the word "articles", insert "except aircraft exclusively for commercial purposes."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. MILLER: Page 2, line 9, after the word "State", insert a colon, strike out the balance of the paragraph, and insert "Provided further, That the Export-Import Bank of Washington is authorized to loan to Finland on proper application not to exceed $20,000,000 without restriction on the type of merchandise to be purchased in the United States."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for 8 minutes.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest to the words of our colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE]. I think most of the Members of the House listened to that distinguished gentleman. If his argument is sound and a loan to Finland is but a step toward war, then I trust that this bill will be rejected in toto, because undoubtedly if authority is given to increase the capital of the Export-Import Bank loans will be made to China and may be made to Finland, both of which are in the same category as to state of war.

We now come to the point where we must decide whether or not we want the Export-Import Bank to make a loan to Finland for purchases here in the United States of material that she can use to defend her territory and her liberty.

This amendment will not force Finland to buy munitions in the United States. It simply leaves to Finland the decision as to what she needs most with which to defend herself. I suggest it as a mild, reasonable amendment. It does not go as far as some Members of this House would like to go, but it certainly expresses the desire of Congress that the Export-Import Bank make a loan to Finland without restriction. The bank has that right now, without restriction.

Most of the Members of this House applauded the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] when he made such a soul-stirring address yesterday. I am hopeful that if this amendment is adopted the President of the United States will approve of the bill as amended, feeling that this is a safe step.

I cannot understand, in view of some of the arguments presented on the floor this morning, why it is unneutral for the Congress to indicate that we want the bank to make a loan, but it is absolutely neutral for Mr. Jones to make the loan of his own volition. Where does the question of neutrality enter this proposition? No one has challenged our right to make a loan to Finland. We have made them one loan since the outbreak of the unpleasantness now going on—and unpleasantness that we used to refer to as war. We have loaned China $25,000,000 for the purchase of trucks. Undoubtedly those trucks were used by their army. No one denies our right to sell munitions to Finland, provided we do not violate our neutrality law.

Mr. Hackworth, of the State Department, said:

> Now, if we assume that Finland is not at war—and I might say that both Finland and Soviet Russia stated to us that they are not at war—we are not confronted with the question of neutrality. If they are not at war, we can sell Finland anything that we like, and the question of neutrality does not arise.

That was the testimony of the representative of the State Department before the House Committee on Banking and Currency.

We were told during the special session that it was ridiculous to sell material that could be used to manufacture munitions to a belligerent and not to sell them implements of war. Do you recall the words of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] during the neutrality debate when he asked, "Is it unneutral to sell a Chinaman a rifle with which to defend his home?" The question can be asked today applied to Finland. Finland is not a belligerent.

This amendment does not violate our neutrality. Finland must get its purchases home in ships other than ours. I have heard only one argument against this amendment that might have merit, and that is the element of possible delay. That can be forgotten in view of the action this Committee has taken this morning. We have adopted two amendments which make it necessary that this bill go to the other body. If the other body, in its wisdom, wants to assume responsibility for delay, the responsibility must lie on the other body; but we should write this bill as we want it written today while we have the opportunity.

I think it is fair to submit that if we cannot loan money to Finland that they can use to purchase munitions and implements of war, then we cannot make them a loan at all, because I think no Member will challenge the statement that money is as much contraband as cannon, cartridges, or any other implement of war. We are not instructing Mr. Jones to make this loan. We are indicating our desire, and I have confidence, as have you, that Mr. Jones will carry out the expressed desire of Congress. We were told yesterday from the Well of this House that our own War Department had said that only 25 percent of war expenses went into munitions and implements of war, but the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] also put into the RECORD this fact, as coming from the Commerce Department, that while the previous statement as to 25 percent being war expense was true, 98 percent of the purchases made by Russia in this country have been for war materials. If we are going to permit the export of munitions and implements of war to Russia; if we are going to finance Russia's war by buying her gold at $35 an ounce when it costs her only $11, then I for one insist that we permit Finland to buy whatever she needs in this country out of whatever money she borrows from the Export-Import Bank. I would still prefer to embargo all implements of war, but Congress has decided otherwise.

I think we might at this time refer to the testimony of Mr. Jones. I questioned Mr. Jones in the committee. I said to him:

> I cannot see any reason for making any distinction between loaning money to Finland in this case, knowing that they are going to buy wheat or knowing that they are going to buy munitions. Would it not be in line with the vote of Congress in the special session to give Finland $20,000,000 and say to her, "We do not care whether you use that credit with some aircraft company or some munitions manufacturer?"

Mr. Jones answered:

> We have no objection if Congress wants to tell us to do it that way.

Further in the hearings Mr. Jones said:

> I think this bill should be passed if we want to continue to aid our export-import business. So far as the question of Finland is concerned, under this act you give enough discretion to us, you show us that the majority of the people in Congress would like us to lend the money to Finland.

I then said:

> Did you ask it to be more specific than that?

Mr. Jones replied:

> I asked it to be more specific, but did not get it.

All my amendment does is to give Mr. Jones the specific instructions that he stated to us he had asked for, an expression of our desire to notify the people of the country that we are considering Finland. For this reason I offer this amendment. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. CELLER to the amendment offered by Mr. MILLER: Strike out the word "Provided," and all thereafter.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, the effect of my amendment will be merely to strike out of the Miller amendment any reference to Finland. I agree with the gentleman from Connecticut that there should be taken from the bill all mention of limitation of the use of the money or prohibition, and the Export-Import Bank should be untrammeled to make the loan regardless of the purposes to which Finland may put it. But assuredly and above all a loan should be made to courageous, debt-paying Finland. My amendment should not, cannot, be construed by any stretch of imagination as any bar to a Finnish loan.

I am of the firm conviction that Finland needs arms and ammunition and should have the right to purchase arms and ammunition without let or hindrance. She asks for bullets and what do we give her? We give her beans. She asks for powder, and what do we give her? We give her peas. She asks for cannon and we give her broomsticks. It is utterly ridiculous.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. MILLER. I assume that the gentleman knows that if Mr. Jones has the power, he will not make a loan for munitions of war unless we so instruct him.

Mr. CELLER. I hope Mr. Jones will not so conclude. If either the Connecticut gentleman's amendment or my amendment prevails, Mr. Jones has ample authority to make a loan for the purpose of the purchase of munitions. When a loan was made to China there were no restrictions. There should be none. Just think for a moment. As the gentleman from Connecticut stated, and as I reiterated yesterday, 98 percent of the export material sent to Russia today is munitions of war. Furthermore, Russia purchases from us 300,000 barrels of gasoline every month for use in Stalin's planes to bomb Finnish cities and destroy innocent women and children. On the other hand, showing our unneutrality in that fashion, we come here in psalm-singing hypocrisy when we say or vote that Finland shall not use any of the money we loan her to defend herself against those death-dealing Russian planes and tanks that are also propelled by American gasoline.

Take Japan and her war on China. I discovered from my investigation that of all the material we supply Japan 85 percent is used for military purposes. Included in that material are American-made planes equipped with American-made bombs used ruthlessly to slaughter defenseless Chinese women and children. We loaned money to China. She could buy with it antiaircraft guns or other planes to defend her people. There was no restriction. I simply ask for the same treatment of Finland.

Surely we could find a way to help poor Finland, particularly if we help Japan in the way indicated and if we help Russia in the way indicated. In other words, if we can, with eyes open, aid Russia and Japan to slaughter the innocent, we should readily find the way to help Finland defend herself against terrible odds, against a destroyer of democracy.

The President of Finland, Kyosti Kallio, full of "sisu"—the Finnish word for courage—last week said:

> We are deeply grateful for the help America has extended us with humanitarian materials, but such help must be altered if the Finnish population is not to be massacred. If our civilians—our old men, women, and children—are to be killed in their houses, as is happening every day in our cities, towns, and villages, they will have no need for food and clothing.

He said they needed airplanes and antiaircraft guns. Mr. Kallio made this solemn promise to our authorities:

> That the planes would not operate beyond the Finnish borders or against planes or troops engaged in genuine military operations; that they would be used only to defend the towns and cities—to defend innocent men, women, and children.

We must help the plucky Finns against the "red" Goliath, against the "red" Moloch, against Ogpu terrorism. Humanity demands it. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Let the Chair make an announcement. The Chair will try to accommodate every Member who desires to speak on this bill. There are pending at the desk several genuine amendments. The Chair will endeavor to handle these amendments in such way as to accommodate all who have spoken to the Chair for time.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Michigan rise?

Mr. DINGELL. In support of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, if it were germane, and if I thought it would help Finland, I would move to strike out everything after the enacting clause and I would offer the amendment to provide for an unrestricted loan to Finland. Here we are magnanimously providing authority for the Export-Import Bank to make a loan of $20,000,000 to the hardy, courageous Finns who, with their backs to the wall, are fighting the world's battle and our battle for freedom, democracy, and Christianity. We restrict the loan for powder puffs, silken scanty panties, and for cream puffs, when we know the Finns need shrapnel, buckshot, barbwire, and all the fiercest implements of hell because they are fighting to stop anti-Christ and the hosts of hell led by Beelzebub. Let every man stand up and be counted, let him vote as he talks, and let us dispense with hypocrisy and catch phrases. Either we are courageously for Finland, freedom, and Christianity or we are for the dictatorship of Stalin, persecution, murder, depravity, and everything that is base and cowardly.

We are Americans with the red blood of our forefathers coursing in our veins or we are yellow and not worthy of the heritage. Imagine General Washington, Lafayette, Kosciusko, Pulaski, Von Steuben, Barry, Perry, Grant, or Lee hesitating, shrinking, and slinking, giving way before the shadow of the starving, brainless Russian bear which is being led to destruction by a degenerate, scab paperhanger. Imagine their picturesque expressions of burning defiance, which might be provoked at this time and printed for posterity were any of these heroes alive and present today. The world on fire, ignited by two fiends, run amuck, millions of innocent people robbed, murdered, raped, and deported; men, women, and children shot down as though they were mad dogs; property destroyed, churches desecrated and bombed; fortunes confiscated, and a trail of broken hearts and suicides left on blood-drenched Polish and Finnish soil—and we are afraid we might offend Stalin and Hitler.

I would give my last dollar to drive them into hell for all time, and then I would raise Old Glory on high as the symbol of hope and succor to all the free and democratic people of the world, and as a warning to the international bandits and thugs, or I would haul her down lest someone might object to her fluttering in the free breeze, and I would change the bright red bars to yellow as I laid her away forever.

Why restrict the loan to Finland? Is it because of our fear of violating our neutrality? We could, today, loan money to Russia if it were not for the fact that, as a welcher, she is barred by the provisions of the Johnson Act, but otherwise she would be eligible for there is, technically speaking, no war between Russia and Finland, and I am as technical as I can be on this point since it pertains to Russia. I want her to have the full benefit of the technicality which exists. And as to Finland—God bless her and preserve her. She is no welcher; she is and always will be an inspiration to the world and to red-blooded Americanism. As a symbol of righteousness, courage, democracy, and Christianity, she, like Poland, has earned her place in history as freedom's and Christianity's glorious defender. If she goes down all that America stands for will shrink and shrivel, and I dare no longer brag about my Americanism for fear my children might suspect I voted favoring Stalin and Hitler.

So help me, if given the chance I shall vote for no restriction, and a hundred million dollars instead of twenty.

A $20,000,000 loan amounts to less than 15½ cents per capita.

A $60,000,000 loan amounts to little more than 46 cents per capita.

There are enough red-blooded, two-fisted Americans with the normal amount of guts in America today who are willing to risk their 15½ cents to help Finland, and at the same time to risk the displeasure of Stalin and Hitler.

Why hold back in opposition to the tide of public sentiment which, in America today, is at least 95 percent anti-Nazi, anti-Communist, and just as much in favor of an unrestricted loan to Finland. [Applause.]

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, it is with a considerable degree of reluctance that I take the floor at this time, having spoken once on yesterday; but I am fearful over the adoption of all these amendments, some of which are of a highly controversial nature. I am afraid it may inevitably tie up this legislation in conference. We have no assurance that the other body will accept any of the amendments that have been adopted or which may be adopted, neither have we any assurance that the President of the United States will sign the legislation or give it his approval if we place therein an amendment which removes all restrictons. God knows I am in favor of sending Finland airplanes and all other war materials that she may need in order to defend her firesides and her independence, but we must not overlook the fact, Mr. Chairman, that time is of the essence.

Let me read to you a few quotations from Foreign Minister V. A. Tanner's statement, made a few days ago:

> We have applied for a loan of $60,000,000, and our request apparently has been dealt with in the usual peacetime way. The decision was delayed for months. Finally, $20,000,000 were proposed, but even now this amount is being delayed.
>
> It seems the gravity of our situation is not fully realized in the United States. It would be deplorable if our appeal for help were thrown into the orbit of American domestic politics.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CHIPERFIELD. What is the date of that article?

Mr. KNUTSON. It carries no date line. I clipped it out of a paper that came into the reading room this morning. I am informed it is about a week ago.

Let me appeal to the House to expedite this legislation as much as possible. If we take a day or 2 days in the consideration of the bill, perhaps that may not be fatal, but should it go to conference and there become a matter of controversy, it may be delayed for days, possibly weeks, and I need not tell you what the consequences may be. I know you all want to help Finland and I am appealing to you to vote down all amendments to insure its ultimate enactment speedily.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KNUTSON. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I am well aware of the gentleman's desire to help Finland. Does he believe the bill as it stands contains substantial aid for Finland?

Mr. KNUTSON. The measure carries all that we can hope to get at this time. There is no question but what Finland can use $20,000,000 in nonwar materials. She will have to look to some of the powers over in Europe for other assistance.

Mr. MURDOCK of Arizona. I agree with the gentleman that we should help Finland and that this bill as drawn is about all we can hope to get for them through legislation at this time.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Chairman, I appeal to the Members to pass this legislation without the inclusion of any controversial amendments. Let us expedite its consideration. Let it not be said that the American Congress fiddled while Rome burned.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOOK].

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, I am very much in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut. I had prepared a similar amendment, and if the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut is adopted I shall not offer my amendment.

I hope that all Members who have protested their desire to give real assistance to Finland will vote for the Miller amendment. This amendment will allow Finland to purchase any kind of material, either military or nonmilitary, that she may wish to buy. It lifts the restriction as to the kind of purchases that may be made and I believe that we all know what this gallant defender of democracy needs in continuing her fight against the red hordes of Russia. Here is a real opportunity for Members of Congress to demonstrate their hatred of communism.

I have been, and still am, for an unrestricted loan to Finland. A loan whereby they may purchase anything they desire.

A study of the history of this bill, as I said yesterday, will reveal the genesis of the movement to make available to Finland real, tangible, unrestricted assistance. Early in this session, long before the plight of Finland was of widespread concern, I requested the Senator from Michigan, author of this bill, to introduce my bill in its original form. My bill, as you know, provided for an outright unrestricted loan of $60,000,000. True friends of Finland and those who are sincere in their efforts to render real aid to that country have rallied to the support of my proposal. It seems to me that the issue is quite clear here—either you want to help Finland or you do not want to. A vote for the Miller amendment or my bill would be an affirmation of your desire to recognize Finland's stand against an aggressor nation.

The question of our neutrality policy has again been raised in this debate. An unrestricted loan to Finland would in no way violate our neutrality as I have repeatedly pointed out. The State Department will inform you that technically neither Finland nor Russia are at war. Therefore, the legal aspects of the neutrality law do not arise. Since they are not at war we can sell Finland anything that we choose to—military or nonmilitary materials. The important thing is to place the money in the hands of the Finnish Government so that they may purchase any material or equipment which in their judgment will most effectively stop Russia.

I agree with the gentleman from Minnesota that any delay in connection with this matter, or the throwing of this bill into conference would be a very grave mistake, but I do not believe adoption of the Miller amendment will throw this bill into conference. I believe the Senate will agree to accept that amendment. That body is just as much in favor of helping Finland as we are, and if we adopt this amendment I feel certain that it will also agree to it without going into extended conference.

We may adopt this amendment without in any way affecting our neutrality.

Mr. SOUTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOOK. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SOUTH. What assurance does the gentleman have that this is not a matter involving policy which will have to be referred to the President and to other administration leaders? I heartily agree with the gentleman from Minnesota that if we want to help Finland we better go along with what has already been threshed out by the administration leaders in order to get something done.

Mr. HOOK. If the administration leaders have not decided on a policy with regard to this situation up to the present time, it is about time that they do something.

Mr. SOUTH. They have done so, and this bill represents what they have agreed to. The gentleman knows that.

Mr. HOOK. A review of the history of the bill under consideration will show that it started by the introduction by myself of a bill on January 3 providing for a $60,000,000 unrestricted loan.

I hope that a sufficient number of Members of this House will assist me in obtaining action on the bill. Our people from the humblest voter to the President of the United States have expressed their feeling on the Finnish-Russian situation. All that is lacking now is for the Members of this body to carry out the wishes of the overwhelming majority of the citizens of the United States. My bill providing for an unrestricted $60,000,000 loan was introduced only after weeks of most careful consideration, innumerable conferences, and intensive study of the Finnish economic situation and their needs in this conflict. I feel certain that the administration would carry out effectively and with haste any legislation along this line. It is up to us to definitely and positively state on the floor of the House that we want to provide an unrestricted loan for Finland.

I believe there would not be any opposition.

Mr. KEEFE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOOK. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. KEEFE. Is it not a fact that under the rules this bill as presently amended, without further amendments, will have to go to conference? It must go to conference?

Mr. HOOK. It may go to conference but there is no reason why the conferees should not immediately report it back.

Mr. KEEFE. The committee has already amended the bill.

Mr. HOOK. As the gentleman from Wisconsin states, the committee has offered an amendment to the bill.

Mr. Chairman, I feel this amendment is a proper amendment and should be adopted by the House.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EATON].

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I doubt if in the history of this Congress there ever has been a situation so unworthy of our integrity and self-respect, so steeped in hypocrisy and cowardice, as centers around this legislation. I am for the Miller amendment. I hope it will go through. I shall vote for it. I have a similar amendment of my own, and I am holding it in reserve as a second line of defense.

A year ago the administration sent up here a bill providing for $100,000,000 to be added to the resources of the Export-Import Bank. That bill was turned down by the House in a moment of unusual independence. Now, after months of waiting, we have this identical bill brought in here asking for $100,000,000 for the Export-Import Bank, and this request is camouflaged by being hung on the wounds of Finland. In accord with a sordid hyprocisy the whole Nation has been led to believe that this is a Finnish-relief bill. It is nothing of the kind. It is a banking bill. It ought to be settled as such on banking principles by banking authorities. If we believe, as I am willing to believe, that it is a good thing to have exports from this country encouraged by our Government, then we should vote for this bill on its merits as a banking bill. But to tie up the great policy question of Finnish relief with this banking proposition puts us who have to vote on this measure in the same situation as the old Scotch woman who was praying for bread, and a college boy put a loaf down her chimney. She said, "Well, the Lord sent it, even if the devil brought it." We are in that condition here today. If we vote against this bill, the country will be told that we have voted against helping Finland. If we line up and vote for this bill, we will have been forced to vote for the most perfect and slick example of political flimflam and skullduggery that has occurred in 16 years of my life in this House. [Applause.]

The people of Finland are our spiritual brethren. They are fighting and dying for every ideal that our country stands for. They are in great danger and distress. We have the means to help them. They have asked us to help them. They are in the same position as one of our families or one of our communities would be if a deadly plague afflicted them. They know, we know, and the world knows, that we have an abundant supply of a precious serum that will head off this plague. They ask us for a small portion of that supply. We tell them in unctuous tones that we will not let them have the serum, but we have on hand a fine brand of embalming fluid which we will be glad to ship them and which they can use. We want these, our beloved brethren of Finland, when they are being slaughtered by the Russian monster to be "well fed, well clothed, and well housed," so that the slaughter will amount to something worth while when it is really finished; but as for any real attempt to keep the Finns from being slaughtered, we hide behind a barricade of sentimental twaddle, of cringing cowardice, and political flimflamism that is absolutely disgraceful and unworthy of the Representatives of a great Nation animated by a sound and normal moral passion. The American people know that we in our greatness and our liberty ought to stand by Finland and help them. They know that the danger which threatens Finland threatens also to destroy every free community in the world. We ought not to be afraid of Russia or of anybody else on the face of the earth. We ought to be afraid only of not doing what is right by our own kind of people when they need our aid.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that the Miller amendment will be adopted. Do not forget that this amendment was proposed by a veteran of the World War who sits in our midst today a living illustration of what happens to men when they get into this horrible thing we call war. In accord with the moral sense of our whole Nation, he believes in sending real aid to Finland. That is what our people want to do. That is what I want. I am for the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER] and for his amendment. I am going to vote for it, and I hope you will all do the same. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CASEY].

Mr. CASEY of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I am for the Miller amendment and in hearty accord with the sentiments expressed by the gentleman from New Jersey, who just preceded me. Men can rise on this floor and try to divert our minds to thoughts of Export-Import Banks, to thoughts of stimulating exports and thoughts of lending money through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, but the minds of the men and women in this Chamber today, as well as the minds of the men and women throughout this broad land of ours, refuse to be diverted. They are fixed upon one thing, whether or not we are really going to aid Finland. It is to this question and to this question alone that I address myself.

Here is a brief history of why Finland comes before us today asking for help: In 1933 Russia signed a nonaggression pact with Finland. The former recognized Finland's independence and the inviolability of her territory. Contrary to that pact of 1933, contrary to Russia's signed guaranty, the Russian Government demands territories and privileges from Finland which no independent nation and no free people could concede without losing both independence and freedom.

Russia demanded what? She demanded that the mutual boundary be moved westward farther into Finnish territory. She demanded that it be moved westward to the Karelian Isthmus, and that certain islands off the southerly coast of Finland, and Finland's most southerly tip of land, Cape Hango, be granted to Russia for a military and naval base.

Furthermore, Russia demanded Finland's entry into a nonaggression pact. Russia is now fighting Finland in violation of a nonaggression pact entered into by Russia with Finland in 1933, but as part of her inordinate demand today she asks another nonaggression pact with Finland which Finland will have to live up to but which Russia can, of course, disregard with all the brutality of the more powerful nation. She demands a nonaggression pact with Finland giving her the right to garrison Finland in the event of an emergency, and at any time convenient to Russia's aims, with the bare statement that she, Russia, is threatened with an attack from the west, she could move in and garrison parts of Finland.

These demands meant but one thing, that if Finland were to submit to them she would lose her independence and her freedom and degenerate into a Russian protectorate, where Communist dictatorship would soon be in force.

Now, Finland has done what to bring about this aggression? She did not threaten anyone; she did not demand anything of anybody, except the right to live in peace and to develop her natural economic and cultural institutions.

Finland has decided unanimously to oppose the demands of Russia, despite the fact that the extortioner is a nation of nearly 200,000,000, whereas Finland has a bare 4,000,000. The present Russian strategy largely is large-scaled air attacks. What does Finland need? She needs a large number of pursuit planes and antiaircraft guns. This is what she needs, not pious words of sympathy, not merely commercial things, not limitations upon loans. She needs steel, iron, and bullets to fight steel and iron and bullets. Finland is in the front-line defense. It is the defense of any self-respecting man's right to live a free life. She is fighting the fight of democracy.

I do not care what Communist Russia may think of our action. I think we are obligated to ourselves and our consciences to aid that gallant nation. She is fighting the fight of democracy; and if we let her down, it will be like dropping mercury on a cold day—it will chill democracy throughout the world. [Applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I wonder if we cannot agree on time for closing debate on this amendment. We have a number of other amendments, and I do not myself see any use of talking all the afternoon on one amendment. Of course, many of the amendments are similar.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that upon each amendment that has been considered the Chair has tried to recognize as many Members to speak as possible.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. There are other amendments to be offered, and I would like to have an agreement to limit debate. I suggest, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this amendment close in 25 minutes.

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, will the Chairman tell us how many Members wish to speak on the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. There are six Members, including the members of the committee, who desire to speak on the amendment.

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman from Missouri ask unanimous consent to limit debate to 30 minutes so each of us will be sure of having 5 minutes?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending amendment close in 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALLEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I am well aware of the fact that there are two issues involved in the legislation before us this afternoon; one pertains to the banking features of the bill and the other pertains to the loan to Finland. We can say that there are two factors involved, because the Members of this House and the people of our Nation have been led to believe that this is primarily a bill which will guarantee a loan to the Finnish Government.

I am not going to take issue with the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee regarding the banking features of this bill. I shall confine my remarks to the amendment now before us. I wholeheartedly support the Miller amendment because it gives the Members of this House a clean-cut opportunity to vote on the question of a Finnish loan. This is the only opportunity those who feel that this Government should grant an unrestricted loan to Finland will have to express their views. This is our only opportunity to vote on that issue.

Now, regarding the question of a possible delay if this bill goes to conference, I dare say the Finnish people would be glad to wait a week if they could have $20,000,000 for unrestricted purchases rather than $20,000,000 immediately with restrictions for civil commodities only attached to it.

This morning the Foreign Affairs Committee was considering a bill for the relief of Polish refugees. While I cannot speak for the whole committee, I feel that there is a great deal of sympathy for donating money for relief purposes to the Polish refugees. Must we wait until the liberty-loving, peace-loving people of this world become refugees and are thrown on the bosom of the world for charity before we are willing to lend money? Is it not more sensible to loan money in advance so that these free nations will not be destroyed, rather than wait until they have been crushed and then give their people charity? I, for one, would rather give them the means by which they can defend themselves now. If we do not help Finland now, we will be called upon in the weeks to come to vote funds for the relief of Finnish refugees. By then free Finns will have been decimated and the scalp of another democracy will hang on a dictator's belt.

Mr. Chairman, on the Fourth of July and other national holidays in this country many of us, and many of our public leaders, appear on the public platform and talk about the great principles of freedom, liberty, democracy, and Christianity. Here is a chance this afternoon for us to pay a little more than lip service to these principles. Here is our opportunity to prove whether or not we so deeply believe in those principles that we are willing to risk a few dollars in their defense. Remember that some 160 years ago men like Lafayette, Rochambeau, Von Steuben, Kosciusko, and others came to this country to help liberate it from tyranny. They were willing to risk not only their fortunes but their lives, and we have exalted their memories ever since because of the principles for which they stood. Nobody is asking a single American to risk his life for Finland today. All the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER] asks in his amendment is that we loan a few dollars so that these principles in which we so strongly believe and which we cherish so deeply may be preserved. If we support the Miller amendment, I believe that liberty and freedom, democracy and Christianity, will be just a little more secure throughout the world and in this country in the years to come. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD] for 4 minutes.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I asked for time yesterday and I fully explained to the House that this debate would give an opportunity to Members on both sides to express themselves on the matter of helping Finland. The bill merely authorizes Mr. Jones to loan this money, if he thinks Finland can repay it. In the public mind this is a Finnish loan, however. We cannot help that, but that is a fact. So what possible harm is there in mentioning Finland specifically in the bill? In any event, I repeat, if you vote against this amendment, you will find it difficult, indeed, to square yourselves in the opinion of the American people. You certainly are in a position to vote for the amendment, Finland not having been declared a belligerent. That is what we are trying to bring about. We wish to be helpful to the Members on both sides of the House, and enable them to express themselves as at least desiring that Finland be assisted.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. The gentleman, of course, realizes that there is authority to lend money to Finland now.

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. And this does not add a thing to it.

Mr. GIFFORD. Oh, I think it is an expression of public opinion. If this is adopted I shall vote for the bill, but if the gentleman refuses to have the bill contain an expression in favor of Finland, then I shall feel perfectly free to vote against it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Although there is the authority in the bill now to make a loan to Finland, yet it is the gentleman's idea that Finland of all the nations should be singled out and all of the others discriminated against in this legislation?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes; because in both branches of the Congress, and in the press all over the country, this is known as the Finnish bill, and as I told the gentleman, we cannot help you get the additional $100,000,000 for general loans in that way. I say to you on the other side, it is harmless and you ought to vote for it.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes.

Mr. CELLER. I understand the gentleman's position is that he desires—as I do, and as the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER] does—to strike out any prohibition against loans for military purposes.

Mr. GIFFORD. The Miller amendment does that.

Mr. CELLER. But he wants the nation Finland mentioned in the amendment.

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes; but Finland has not been declared a belligerent, and Mr. Jones could loan that money now for that.

Mr. CELLER. So that either with or without my amendment—and my amendment would strike out Finland—nevertheless the gentleman would be opposed to any military limitation in the bill.

Mr. GIFFORD. Yes; and I hope that we can accomplish such aid directly and not, as the gentleman's leader said, through barter with some other country. The thought I wish to express is this: This is a simple, easy way for us to clear ourselves of—whatever you want to call it—misunderstanding, if you wish. But there is no misunderstanding in the minds of the American people regarding the vote that you are about to cast.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California [Mr. GEYER] for 4 minutes.

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the Miller amendment. I will not speak directly to that, because yesterday I was unable to get time. So, if I go a little bit from the Miller amendment, I hope you will bear with me.

Mr. Chairman, this body is considering increasing the capital of the Export-Import Bank to $200,000,000 in order that immediate loans may be made to Finland and China and later to any other such neutrals as those in charge of the bank may care to assist.

MY OPPOSITION NOT PROMPTED BY LACK OF SYMPATHY

I do not wish my opposition to this measure to be construed as a lack of sympathy for weaker nations that may be locked in deadly embrace with stronger ones. I have stood in the Well of this House and urged this Congress to assist China by shutting off the supplies of scrap iron and oil that are making possible the invasion of that country. I have been sympathetic with all the smaller countries that have been at the mercy of invaders. No one, since I have been in the House, has lifted his voice oftener than I in behalf of those in distress.

MY CONCERN IS FOR MY OWN NATION'S WELFARE

I am driving out of my mind the sympathetic emotions that continue to rise there. I am cold-bloodedly analyzing this bill in terms of the effect of its passage on our own Nation's welfare. In other words, I am asking Members of this body and myself, "What will be the effect of the passage of this measure on the future welfare of our own beloved land?"

PASSAGE OF THIS ACT A STEP TOWARD WAR

What is the route to war? Does a Congress just suddenly decide to declare war? We all know when we think of our last venture that President Wilson and the Congress were reelected mainly on the assumption that all had done their part in keeping out of the conflict. How, then, did it happen a President asked for a declaration of war and a Congress obliged him? Did they all forget their pledges to the people to such an extent that they arbitrarily pushed us into the conflict? No; the entry into the war was made because the people demanded it of their elected representatives.

WHY PEOPLE CHANGED THEIR MINDS

In the early part of the war we had sympathies in no marked degree for either side. There was even a time when there was much talk of our entering on the side of the Central Powers.

THEN SOMETHING HAPPENED

Our international bankers made loans and investments to the Allies. Immediately that section of the press controlled by these interests began to find "incidents of brutality by the murderous Huns." Next the Government loaned money to the Allies—in reality to safeguard the investments made by private corporations. Now new "atrocities" were discovered and "actual" photographs—of waxed figures supplied by the French Ministry of Foreign Propaganda—of Belgian children with hands cut off and the like were shown by poster, on the screen, and described by the press.

The real fuel for the demand to kill came when "brave little Belgium" was overrun. There was now real material at hand to fan into a white heat the sympathies of the people. Soon the movies were playing patriotic songs and showing patriotic pictures; soon the daily papers were appearing decorated in red, white, and blue; soon the ministers of the gospel were putting Christ in the uniform; and soon the schools and colleges were furiously teaching a hate-breeding brand of education, deleting from their history and song books all reference to anything German in origin and taking from their curriculum all courses in the German language. Anyone who so much as dared to suggest that there might be something said on the side of the Germans took his life in his own hand. Sauerkraut became liberty cabbage and all names borrowed from the German language were immediately Englishized. I personally know of one farmer whose house and barns were burned because he had a distinctly German name and could not speak English. Under the lash of a frenzied public opinion, the President and many Members of the Congress felt themselves released from any promises previously made and war was declared. Thus we see, judging from the past, that our first step into war came when, under the lash of sympathy for a small nation, we loaned money to save a few investors.

SITUATION TODAY PARALLEL

We have a parallel situation today. There are American investments in nickel mines, paper mills, and other factories in Finland. We have the small and overrun nations in Finland and China. We are now asked to loan money, the next step, and next we will be asked to send our boys to protect the investments of private interests and Government. My colleagues, we must stop and think. We must not blindly follow the deadly path of a quarter of a century ago just because our sympathies draw us that way.

CONTRARY TO THE NEUTRALITY LAW

Last session we passed a bill that prohibited loans to belligerents. Can anyone for a moment say that China and Finland are not belligerents? Does the absence of a formal declaration of war make a country less of a belligerent when that country is killing and having its own sons blown to pieces? Ask the mothers of the Finnish boys and the families of dead Chinese soldiers whether or not their countries are at war.

LET US FACE THE FACTS

Let us face the facts. This bill is being backed strongest by those who hope to sell supplies—yes, even war supplies to the borrowing countries. They are so eager for profits that they are willing to risk our danger of involvement. This bill even makes the sale of planes legal.

WHERE ARE YOU BUDGET BALANCERS?

Where do you stand who are so strong for economy? You who have constantly shaved in the neighborhood of 10 percent from the all-too-meager requests made by the President's Budget? Are you going to throw this money away to governments that may not even exist at this time next year? Our experience as a lender of money to foreign nations has not been exactly a money-making venture.

MONEY NEEDED AT HOME

Is this Congress going to forget its own people? What about using this money to assist our own unemployed, our small-business man, our small farmer, our four and one-half million unemployed youth, our aged persons who need assistance, or our needy veterans? Do we have the moral right to send purchasing power away that is so badly needed at home? Better talk of protecting democracy at home before going abroad, or better talk of relieving suffering here in the United States before going into foreign countries. Let those who care to give, give through private agencies, but let us not make the Government a party in the perennial European quarrels. We must not officially take sides. Let us make our stand right here and place a blockade in this road that leads to war by breaking this link of the chain. I for one intend to do so and to do the same at every step in that direction. Then, if and when we come to the last step—that of declaring war—I shall vote against it, even though every soul in my district desires otherwise. After all, God has commanded, "Thou shalt not kill."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Chairman, it was not my intention to take the floor again today, but there is one thing I think we are all quite sure of. One hundred and thirty million people have been led to believe that this bill is for the purpose of helping Finland, and unless this House gives some expression, takes some official action, the public may be misled as to the motive of Congress. At least the Miller amendment puts us on record as to just exactly the purpose we have in passing this particular bill.

I must say that our acts are very inconsistent with what we propose to do here today. I am only repeating, because the public ought to know, that while we propose to loan $20,000,000 to Finland, we are just pouring war materials into Russia to cut the throat of the Finlanders.

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REED of New York. I yield.

Mr. SOUTH. It is a fact, however, that if Finland has the money to buy war materials, she can buy them on the same basis that Russia is buying them. Is that not the fact?

Mr. REED of New York. Russia would not have any credit to buy anything if the administration were not paying her for the gold that they are sending in here, at a profit of $24 an ounce. The gentleman knows that.

Mr. SOUTH. But the gentleman does not contend we are favoring Russia over Finland insofar as the purchasing of war supplies is concerned?

Mr. REED of New York. I should say that we are, because Russia is the aggressor. We know that Russia, after President Roosevelt recognized her, has violated the treaties she made with this Government. We know that she has been carrying on her subversive propaganda. We know that she does not deserve the slightest consideration by this Government at the present time; yet this country is sending Russia her essential war material. I want you to see the picture, because it is a ghastly one for our Nation, which professes to be so interested in the great fight that Finland is making for liberty, to arm Russia with bombing planes and bombing engines, to supply the gas and increase the exports of copper.

I have written to the Department of Commerce, and notice this: Whereas before the invasion of Finland we were shipping practically no copper to Russia, in the month of January 1940 our shipments of copper were $6,997,000; metal-working machines, $2,205,000; brass and bronze, $630,000; electrical machinery, $585,000; petroleum products, $187,000; other commodities, $448,000.

I cannot see any rhyme or reason why we should be so meticulous here as to what Finland should buy with this money when we without any hesitation, without the gesture of a moral embargo, permit munition makers to send all these war supplies into Russia, which, of course, makes it utterly impossible for Finland to win this war. It just cannot be done. I think it is about time that this Congress stood upon its own legs and asserted itself and protected the self-respect of this country.

Mr. KELLER. What would be the gentleman's solution?

Mr. REED of New York. If we can declare a moral embargo on certain munitions as we have, which moral embargo some of the industries are living up to, we can declare a moral embargo on copper. The copper people seem to have the inside track here. They seem to get all the consideration in trade agreements or what not. I say if there are any morals left in the industries of this country, the President can declare a moral embargo; and this he ought to do if we propose to help Finland by a loan to assist her in her fight for liberty. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. EDWIN A. HALL] for 4 minutes.

Mr. EDWIN A. HALL. Mr. Chairman, every Member of this House, including myself, is placed in a very unfair and unenviable position at this time, for if we vote against the pending measure the folks back home will ask: "Were you against democracy? Were you in favor of Soviet Russia?" On the other hand, if a Member votes for the bill he must be branded back home as a Representative who has absolutely no regard for either economy or good sense.

A loan to a foreign nation on a basis similar to that on which certain previous loans have been made by this country is anything but sure and sound. If we could lend the money provided in this bill to one little country called Finland, I would place my unalterable approval on the bill. But, Mr. Chairman, I can see no alternative than to oppose the bill unless the Miller amendment, or some like amendment providing unrestricted loans to Finland, is adopted.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWIN A. HALL. I yield.

Mr. HOOK. Does not the gentleman believe that if the Celler amendment to the Miller amendment is adopted it will qualify the Miller amendment, because the matter will still be left within the discretion of the Administrator of the Bank?

Mr. EDWIN A. HALL. I cannot answer the gentleman with certainty, because I have not had an opportunity to study the Celler amendment. I do feel, however, that the Miller amendment or some similar amendment is necessary to warrant the passage of this measure.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDWIN A. HALL. I yield.

Mr. CELLER. My amendment would simply take out all mention of countries so as to leave unrestricted discretion in the Export-Import Bank as to what countries they would make loans. It was in no sense a proscription against Finland. It simply leaves full discretion in the Export-Import Bank, and they will undoubtedly make a loan to Finland for all purposes, military or nonmilitary.

Mr. EDWIN A. HALL. As the bill now stands I am very much opposed to it and fear I shall have to vote against it if at the time the vote is taken the bill in its then form permits the promiscuous throwing around of funds by the Export-Import Bank in places from which American capital might better be diverted for use at home. For instance, in my own district—and I am not doing any logrolling at this time—there are many farmers who are absolutely stricken, who do not know where their next meal is coming from. Their plight is brought about because a serious drought, at the end of last summer, ruined their hay crops, and they are unable to feed their stock. Many of them will be forced to fold up and quit. Why would it not be better to divert some of the money provided in this bill to be used for home relief?

I, for one, am very much disappointed that I shall have to vote against the bill; but I see no other way out, because the folks back home will accuse me of squandering funds in foreign lands.

It is high time that the Members of this body got down to the business of putting our own house in order instead of continually butting into the problems of the European continent. My sympathies are for Finland, which I will presently show by voting for the Fish amendment. But to support the bill which we are called upon to vote for is the most outrageous and imprudent step which we can possibly take at this time.

The administration demands on the one hand that we keep out of war, while on the other it is determined to keep promoting schemes which will drag us inevitably into it. I tell you that if such procedure continues, this House will have a war resolution jammed down its throat before we realize it. My warning to everyone is, keep out of war by having nothing to do with measures which deliberately advocate war. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WILLIAMS] for 5 minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, we have fought the battle between Russia and Finland on the floor several times today, and there has been a good deal of tub thumping and breast beating. We have now reached the point where we are about to vote on an important amendment.

I am rather astonished that my friend—and he is my friend—the distinguished member of the Banking and Currency Committee should present an amendment here which would indicate if we make a loan to Finland that we hope and expect the money to be spent for the purchase of war materials, ammunition, and implements of war. As I remember, he was the loudest in protestation against that very thing when the Neutrality Act was before this Congress less than 6 months ago. What is true of him is true likewise of a great many others. The very ones who were then protesting the sale of munitions and war materials on the ground that a movement of that kind or that kind of activity on the part of this Government or any of our nationals would surely lead us into war are the same ones who are now clamoring for an amendment which does the very thing which they then opposed.

Why, I ask you, why take out of this bill the limitation which the bank itself wants in there? Why take out the limitation which Jesse Jones, the Administrator of the bank, wants in the act? Why take out of the bill a limitation which the President himself wants? The limitation which prohibits a loan for the purchase of war materials.

They talk about allowing Finland to use this $20,000,000 as the Finns please in the purchase of arms, munitions, and implements of war. I think I can say, beyond any question, that if you expect any of this money to be used for the purchase of war materials, implements of war, or munitions in this country, you will be sadly disappointed, because, in my honest judgment—and I say this upon the record of the hearings—none, not a dime of it, will be spent for that purpose. In addition to that I say for myself that not a dime of it ought to be spent for that purpose. A loan for such a purpose, if not a positive unneutral act, would be a long step in that direction and may lead us into war.

It may be that some of those who are advocating the expenditure of this money, if Finland gets it, for war materials have within their district munition factories and armament factories; and it may be that their interest in this bill is actuated by that fact. Mr. Chairman, they propose at the expense of the farmers of this country and at the expense of the nonmilitary manufacturers of this country to increase our export trade by the expenditure of this money for the purchase not of agricultural products, not of manufactured products outside of war materials, but for munitions of war, implements of war, and war materials. If they want to go to the country on that kind of an issue and say that we are furnishing this money in order to encourage the manufacture of war materials rather than to encourage the production and export of agricultural products in the interest of the farmers of this country and in the interest of those people who are engaged in civil pursuits, they can do so. As for me, I will not go along. Someone said that the mind of this country is on the question whether we are going to help Finland or not. The question in the minds of the people of this country is, as it has been for the last 6 months, Shall we keep out of this war? I receive communications every day from peace societies, from fathers and mothers, and young men all over the United States, hoping and praying that we will do everything possible to avoid war. If we pass this amendment and announce to the world that we are making a loan here for the purpose of purchasing and exporting war materials, it will be a long step toward leading us into war and arousing the feelings of the people of this country who are already uneasy and disturbed.

Mr. Chairman, by all means this amendment must be voted down. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. PARSONS). All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER].

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment read?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the Miller amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk again read the Miller amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MILLER) there were—ayes 49, noes 106.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EATON].

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, my amendment was in substance similar to the one offered by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER]. Since his amendment has met such an ignominious defeat at the hands of this House, I will keep my amendment in my pocket.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. FISH: Page 1, line 5, after the word "thereof", strike out "$200,000,000" and insert "$120,000,000, of which $20,000,000 is to be lent to the Republic of Finland or the agencies and nationals thereof."

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes on this amendment, because it is a major amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH]?

There was no objection.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, the New Deal goes around, around, and around, and comes out where? With 10,000,000 unemployed, with a deficit of $25,000,000,000 over income, and with one-third of our people underfed, badly clothed, and badly housed, yet the Democratic majority seriously proposes by this bill, after what occurred yesterday in Ohio, in which State two Republican candidates to the House of Representatives were overwhelmingly elected, to vote $100,000,000 of the people's money to finance European nations. Magna est veritas et praevalebit—truth is mighty and will prevail.

What are the facts in regard to this bill? Let us strip the camouflage from it, clear away the smoke screen, and see what we are doing. It is not a bill primarily to help Finland. This is a bill providing $100,000,000 to make loans to Denmark, China, and other nations not for the purpose of trade or commerce but for relief or quasi-war purposes. This is identical with what occurred back in 1919 when we lost our shirts to foreign powers and did not get back one cent in return except from little honest Finland.

When you Democratic Members vote for this bill—and that is where the vote will come from—you are deliberately voting to turn the United States of America again into an international Santa Claus and make it the financial angel to finance European nations, when at the same time the Congress of the United States is deliberately cutting down on relief and on farm subsidies. By this bill we will be subsidizing foreign nations when at the same time we are cutting down on our own relief and subsidies, and even while American citizens are being evicted from their homes. It is now seriously proposed by the Democratic Party to make additional foreign loans of $100,000,000 to Denmark and Scandinavian countries, to China, to Bulgaria, to Rumania, and other foreign nations that might involve us in war; not to South American nations for the purposes of trade, but simply to extend relief to European nations and finance them with American money as a matter of policy, forgetting our own unemployed—and the political revolt spreading against the excessive expenditures by the Federal Government at Washington.

The loan to Finland is the bait or lure held out to persuade Congress to authorize $100,000,000 additional foreign loans. We are to stop home relief and provide for foreign relief. I wonder what the American people back home will think of the Democratic Party and the internationalists again embarking on a big-brother loan campaign as we did in 1919 under our post-war loan policy, all of which have been repudiated except by the Republic of Finland?

The proposal I am making is a very simple one. I have reduced the authorization from $100,000,000 to $20,000,000, and that $20,000,000 is to go to Finland. That is the single exception I am willing to make in furnishing loans to foreign nations and I believe the American people want it done. But the American people do not want us to authorize the expenditure or turn over to a subordinate agency of the Government without any control by the Congress the making of loans to foreign nations for relief or as a matter of international policy, particularly at this time when it may possibly involve us in a war.

Mr. SOUTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SOUTH. If the gentleman believes loans to the other Scandinavian countries will involve this country in war, how does he justify the proposition to make a loan to Finland? In other words, will a loan to Norway be more likely to involve us than a similar loan to Finland?

Mr. FISH. I spoke on that subject yesterday and gave my reasons for making one exception, the Finnish loan. It is because, first, I believe it would not involve us in war with Soviet Russia, and second, because I think Finland is fighting for democracy, Christianity, and civilization against the spread of communism. For those reasons I am willing to make that exception. But if because we make a loan to Finland it is going to follow that we must make loans to the rest of the world, then I would be even against the loan to Finland. If I believed that a loan to Finland would turn the United States into an international Santa Claus for the purpose of financing foreign nations, then I would be against a Finnish loan. That is why I am offering this amendment, so the Members can have a chance to vote for $20,000,000 for Finland and at the same time reduce the amount in the bill $80,000,000. Moreover, there is $30,000,000 left in the Export-Import Bank with which Mr. Jesse Jones can make loans to other nations, but I hope he will make them to Latin American nations to promote our trade.

When we voted $100,000,000 originally it was primarily for loans for trade purposes, and commerce with South and Central America. Now, we are about to depart from that policy. Of course, if we tell the truth about these loans, they are to finance European nations at the present time for relief and maybe for war purposes.

If the Democratic Party wants to go before the country and say that it is willing to finance foreign nations to the extent of $100,000,000, that is their privilege. There is nothing we, on our side, would like more than to be able to expose the internationalism of the New Deal at the expense of destitute and unemployed American citizens, and the peace of our country. But when it comes to a Finnish loan, I believe both sides want to support such a loan, at least to the extent of $20,000,000. If I wanted to help elect additional Republican Members of Congress, I would say more power to you, put through the $100,000,000 and then go back to your farmers and your wage earners when you reduce their benefits and relief, and ask for their approval of your again making Uncle Sam the Santa Claus for foreign nations.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentlewoman from Illinois.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Does not the gentleman believe that since the last war, in which we fought for the principles of democracy, the people have tried to make it very plain that they do not want to finance another foreign war purely to defend the principles of democracy?

Mr. FISH. If you put the question of financing any more of these foreign nations to a vote, 99 percent, Republicans and Democrats, would vote against it. When it comes to the Finnish provision, however, everybody knows that Finland paid its bills. It is the only nation that did. All the nations repudiated the loans we made them after the Armistice, and even repudiated the interest on the loans we made them after the Armistice, except little, honest Finland, and I say thank God for little, honest Finland. She stands alone in a category by herself.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. I want to thank the gentleman for putting it on the principle that he feels it is because Finland has done something for the United States. I believe the gentleman will agree with me that the only right a Congressman has to vote money is when it is done for the welfare of the United States and in payment of services rendered or to be rendered.

Mr. FISH. That is one reason, certainly. There are other reasons. Another reason is that we represent the people. Even the President of the United States, with whom I do not agree very often, said that he thinks 98 percent of the people are for this proposition. Therefore I am willing to go along; if it is the will of the people that we should do something for Finland now. Let us do it, openly and immediately, and let us do it ourselves and instruct the Export-Import Bank to make a specific loan of twenty millions to Finland. If we do not make it, the Communists, "reds", fellow travelers, and all subversive elements will rejoice; but the decent, loyal, democratic, peace-loving American people will hang their heads in shame.

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FISH. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BARRY. The gentleman distinguishes Finland. Does not the gentleman know that little Norway, Sweden, and Denmark never even touched us for a loan?

Mr. FISH. I know that, but, as I have previously stated, I am willing to make the exception to the rule for Finland. I am against all foreign loans with that one exception. If you are going to loan to Finland and then say that because we loaned money to Finland we must loan to China, and then we have to loan to Denmark, Czechoslovakia, Rumania, and all the rest, where are you going to stop? Do you want us to finance the entire world in view of our sad experience after the World War?

Mr. BARRY. The gentleman seems to favor a country that borrowed money rather than the countries that never borrowed at all.

Mr. FISH. I favor the country that paid its bill, and that is Finland, and I favor no other country. I am against all foreign loans except for trade purposes with Latin America. If you want the responsibility, if you Democrats want to be the international Santa Claus, and take that issue to the country—that your party wants to finance these nations for relief and war purposes—that is your lookout. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WILLIAMS] insist upon his point of order?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. I withdraw the point of order, Mr. Chairman, and I would now like to see if we can limit the debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto. I would suggest that debate close in 15 minutes.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to have at least 30 minutes of debate.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I have not said a word on this bill and I would like to have 5 minutes and I believe that any man who wants to talk on it ought to have 5 minutes, and let us not screw them down so tight.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. I do not believe I have been too tight on anybody so far. We have been talking a long time on this bill.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I have not, but the Committee has.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. I have no disposition at all to try to limit the debate unreasonably, but we must come to some kind of limitation here and I have suggested 20 minutes.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Then I will ask that the debate be limited to 30 minutes.

Mr. MASSINGALE. I shall not object to 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAEFER of Illinois. I object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. FISH. I hope the gentleman will not object, because that is ample time.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto close in 30 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GORE. Mr. Chairman, there are two parts of the gentleman's amendment which must have attention in a very brief time. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] first proposes to reduce the amount from $200,000,000 to $120,000,000, thereby precluding any increase in the lending authorization to any applicant other than the Government of Finland.

The gentleman asks, "What are you going to say to your farmers and to your workers?" I must ask the gentleman, What will he say? In one loan which this bank has made there has been made possible the exportation of locomotives by which over 7,000,000 man-hours of work were provided in American shops. The American farmer, manufacturer, and laborer are benefited by the operations of this bank. Exportation of agricultural and manufactured products is facilitated.

The gentleman would curtail this Export-Import Bank, which is a sound and safe operation, as an agency of the Government, and which has made a net earning of over $5,000,000 and has not had a single loss. What will his answer be to his farmers and workers?

Then, by this amendment the gentleman would make a direct mandate of a loan to Finland. In order to properly analyze that, it is necessary to examine just what has been done by the Export-Import Bank with respect to Finland. One $10,000,000 loan has been made, and, Mr. Chairman, it was made quietly and without the fanfare that would be necessarily attendant upon the passage of this amendment. It was clothed with commercial activity and with economic justification, and the entire amount has not yet been used.

The Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, the great Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, and the Senate itself declined to accept similar provisions to this amendment. We can assume and we can presume that the President of the United States and our State Department and the Senate have a sympathy for Finland equal in fervor, intensity, and sincerity to that of the gentleman from New York. Yet from them there is forthcoming no recommendation for a direct loan to Finland. Instead of loans, which may or may not be made without a lot of fanfare; instead of a loan which, if they meet the requirements of the bank as to repayment, meeting commercial requirements, may or may not be made to any applicant or country according to the Administrator's judgment, he would substitute a direct mandate, which would be heralded to the world that this Government by congressional action has committed an overt act of partiality and has to that extent taken sides in this conflict which is now raging.

Ah, we can remember in the special session the gentleman raising his voice in warning. We can hear it now, echoing, as he yielded to the temptation to appeal to the fear in this country and to the scare of war. Can you not hear his cry of "War," with all his vehemence and eloquence? Where is that great isolationist now? He comes here now advocating a direct loan by the Government per se to one country, mandating a loan to that country, and his reason, given in the Rules Committee, for this exception to his policy and his advocacy in the special session on neutrality was that his reasons were obvious. In my opinion, Mr. Chairman, the reasons are entirely too obvious to serve his purpose. The hue and cry in this land of ours is to make safe the operations of this Government, and to make safe the people of this country from involvement in the war. Enactment of this amendment would constitute an overt act. I do not contend that it would necessarily lead to war, but it is a dangerous step which I am unwilling to take at this time. And beneficial though I consider the Export-Import Bank, urgent though I consider the need to increase its authority to make loans to aid exportation, nevertheless, if this amendment is adopted, in my humble judgment, passage of the bill would then be of doubtful advisability. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] for 4 minutes.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Chairman, I think we ought to have in mind very clearly just what this bill is to do. On page 36 of the hearings we find the following:

Miss SUMNER. But we would have to authorize $100,000,000 before you could make a $10,000,000 loan to Finland?

Mr. JONES. Well, I do not know about that definitely.

Miss SUMNER. Did not I understand you to tell me yesterday that in order to make a $10,000,000 loan we would have to authorize $100,000,000?

Mr. JONES. I do not think the bill ought to be based on that assumption. I think if you do not want to pass this bill for general purposes, it should not be passed.

We have had this bill heralded from one end of the country to the other as a bill for a loan to Finland. Mr. Jones, on page 71 of the hearings, said:

Therefore let us forget about Finland.

I cannot see any sense in voting for a bill on false representation. I would not oppose a bill carrying a moderate loan to Finland to help them out, but what is the program with reference to this bill? On page 74 of the hearings it appears in the beginning of Mr. Jones' testimony on that page that there were commitments of $20,000,000 to Finland, $20,000,000 to China, $10,000,000 to Sweden, $10,000,000 to Denmark, $10,000,000 to Norway, leaving $10,000,000 perhaps to expand South American trade. Frankly I cannot see any sense in our going into the promiscuous business of loaning money to foreign countries, to let them come in here and buy arms and ammunition. If we are going to loan a lot of money to Finland, let us do it. At the same time let us issue a proclamation along the lines of the Neutrality Act which will prohibit some of these shipments to Russia. Russia today is taking out of here gasoline, munitions, copper, and all sorts of things which she is using to clean up Finland. We are working at cross purposes in financing foreign countries to carry on war and I want to see that limited just as far as it can be limited. I would like to see it cut. I am going to vote for this amendment because I want to see it cut to $20,000,000, and then it will specifically provide that that money shall go to Finland, and not be scattered all over the lot.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MASSINGALE] for 4 minutes.

Mr. MASSINGALE. Mr. Chairman, I expect that I shall make the kind of a talk here that will classify me as a warrior. I do not know, but I am fed up in this debate with what might be termed the livid, ashen complexion of some of the Members of this House when we come to talk about extending real relief to that country, Finland, than which no greater has ever existed in the history of this world, in my judgment. There is no use in singing any further the praises or heroics of Finland. That country is face to face now with a most serious proposition, and what is the Congress of the United States going to do about it? Are we going to sit here in our flatulence and say, "No; we are afraid to do anything"? We say it is risky to loan to the Finns, yet we loan to Russia to get the material with which to murder the Finns. If we do not violate our neutrality by making loans to Russia, why is it violating any rule of right to make loans to Finland? Frankly, I feel we are shirking a great responsibility to society, decency, and democracy to fail Finland and continue to ship implements of war to Russia. My sentiments are wholly for the Finns. If I had my way about it, I would use every ship we have in the United States Navy to go over there and rescue those people, and the United States Navy could do it, and we would be in no danger of involvement in this war; or if we were in danger of it, then I would say meet the danger and meet it like men did in the years gone by when this country was in distress. The question has been asked—and we are confronted with it—Where would we be today if in 1776 we had had the type of statesmanship that seems to control the Congress of the United States in 1940? We cannot afford, in my judgment, to just sit here and raise a whirlwind and not take an active step and give to Finland that which Christianity and decency and morality all say we should. I am willing to assume my part of the responsibility. [Applause.] We should not withhold a single penny of credit they may want to defend themselves against the greedy, godless, and murderous bunch of Russian Communists. We need not fear war from them. They have no respect for God or Christianity, but they have respect for the guns and fighting qualities of our seamen.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CREAL] for 4 minutes.

Mr. CREAL. Mr. Chairman, I have heard it said that a man's body changes every 7 years, but I have never read how often he has the privilege of changing his mind. During the last regular session and the special session the peacetime party was on our left. The President was duly scolded, denounced, and harangued because he expressed an opinion, and he was condemned for giving an interview as to whom he thought was the aggressor. No gentleman was louder in that than the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH], whose amendment is pending. He said that they should keep their mouth out of it. In other words, play the ostrich like we did not know anything was happening on the other side at all.

When I say that the left has become the war party, I am also reminded of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Connecticut when he opposed the neutrality amendments. His description of the horrors of the battlefield lingers with me yet. He said he wanted it to be said that you could not find any shells on the battlefields of Europe labeled "Made in America." Now, this war veteran reaches clear over himself and wants the Government officially to give notice to all governments of the world that the American Congress has completely reversed itself from the position it occupied then, and to say that we are in favor of helping Finland with a direct Government loan.

Now the loan is limited by the amount we are voting in the Export-Import Bank, but a direct Government loan is presumed to be unlimited, if we start on the other program of making direct loans out of the Federal Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. CREAL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 additional minute.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. I do not have the time. The time has been limited.

The CHAIRMAN. It is impossible to entertain that request, because the time has been fixed.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. The time has been fixed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAWFORD], a member of the committee.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that this bill has to do with an increase in the capital structure of the Export-Import Bank, presumably it was for the purpose of facilitating exports, and I wish to make comment on another phase of the same type of activity.

There is the proposed inter-American bank, and the purpose of it is to facilitate exports. If that goes into operation, then why should we increase this $100,000,000? By reason of the fact that I am opposed to the increase of $100,000,000, then I am in favor of reducing this increase to $20,000,000.

The proposed inter-American bank would have its legal foundation in a convention between the participating republics. A draft of the convention, as well as a draft of the proposed bylaws, has been submitted by the Inter-American Financial and Economic Advisory Committee.

The draft convention in its first article contained the following significant sentence:

> The United States of America also agrees to grant to the bank a charter substantially in accordance with the proposed charter, annexed hereto.

The draft of charter of the Inter-American Financial and Economic Advisory Committee on February 6, 1940, carries the following important note just below the title:

> Such charter to be granted by an act of Congress of the United States of America.

Now, from what I have just read two things are perfectly clear:

First. The bank cannot come into existence until the convention is ratified by the United States Government.

Second. The bank cannot come into existence until the Congress of the United States issues a charter.

But if the two points just mentioned are clear, it is also clear from the text of the proposed convention which I have just quoted that ratification of the convention by the United States Government involves the Congress of the United States in a specific commitment to issue the bank's charter.

If the executive branch of the United States Government signs the proposed convention and if the Senate ratifies it, those steps, therefore, will commit the Congress to charter this international bank.

But there seems to be another possibility. This is the possibility that the executive branch of the Government may alone ratify the convention and that the convention may go into effect without being submitted to the Senate at all. If that happens, it will amount to the executive branch of the United States Government obligating the Congress of the United States to the issuance of a charter for an international bank in which at the outset not less than $5,000,000 of the American people's money, and more likely $13,000,000 will be invested.

Is it conceivable that the proposed convention may be put into effect without specific and formal approval by the Senate? I think it is. Many international agreements have been entered into by the American Government without the specific endorsement and approval by the Senate. Treaties, the Constitution says, must be submitted to the Senate for ratification. But not all international agreements are called treaties. If it is not a "treaty," it does not go to the Senate for approval.

Thus, for example, the well-known London silver agreement of 1933, entered into at the time of, but outside of, the World Economic Conference. That notorious document, under which the United States undertook to do a great deal for the world's sellers of silver with virtually no corresponding contribution from the beneficiaries of the agreement, was never ratified by the Senate.

It was never even submitted to the Senate. Perhaps the administration thought that it was sufficient that the agreement had been signed by a Member of the Senate who went to London for the purpose. Who gave that Senator authority to thus commit the United States is, incidentally, a matter that has never been made clear to me.

But the important point I wish to make here today is this: The London silver agreement was ratified in the White House, and not in the Senate. It was ratified by an "Executive proclamation." It was conveniently classified in the State Department's records as an Executive agreement. Its official designation is "Executive Agreement Series No. 63."

All of this was done through clever prearrangement. The text of the United States inspired London silver agreement as worked out in a smoke-filled London hotel room contained the following important and unusual provision:

> A notice by any Government that the affirmative action necessary to carry out the purposes of this agreement has been taken will be accepted as an instrument of ratification.

And the agreement added:

> The Government of the United States is requested to take such steps as may be necessary for the purpose of the conclusion of this agreement.

Under the provisions the President on December 21, 1933, issued a proclamation which for 4 years committed the people of the United States to the purchase of all newly mined domestic silver—not merely the quantity set down in the London document—at a return or price of about 64½ cents an ounce, which was equivalent to 50 percent more than the then market price. Subsequent Executive proclamations increased the subsidy to more than 77 cents an ounce.

The 1933 proclamation was regarded by the Government as constituting affirmative action under the terms of the London silver agreement and a copy of the proclamation was duly filed in the State Department archives as America's instrument of ratification.

The London silver agreement was officially known by the innocuous title "memorandum of heads of agreement," and so forth.

So it seems to me that the logical thing and the important thing and the right thing for us to do is to cut this $100,000,000 increase to $20,000,000 if possible or to eliminate the whole increase and defeat the bill if possible.

So I hope that this amendment will be supported and that not to exceed $20,000,000 will be added to the capital of this bank.

One day we propose and appropriate money with which to subsidize exports in order to increase our out-bound trade. Another day we enact reciprocal trade agreements authority for the purpose of increasing our out-bound trade. Then we let our emotions take control and we repeal previous acts that encourage exports of foodstuffs and take steps that induce foreign countries to materially reduce their purchases of agricultural products grown on American farms, and we thus make the farmer suffer. And here we are today kidding ourselves into believing that a little $100,000,000 will greatly aid our exports when we know full well the net effect of the program, if it is greatly expanded, will be to discourage investment of American funds in Latin American countries and prevent their development on a large scale that would, if permitted to occur, create a vast market for our exports greater by many times than the Export-Import Bank can ever hope to develop even if we should expand its capital 10 times. When will we ever stop our foolishness?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOOK] is recognized.

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Chairman, as this House knows, I repeatedly urged an unrestricted loan to Finland, but I certainly must oppose this amendment, because I think it is a subterfuge in the guise of offering a loan to Finland because of the fact that I honestly believe it is for the very purpose of defeating the bill. It reduces the authorized increase for the bank down to $20,000,000 and provides for a loan of $20,000,000 to Finland. I do not believe that was the purpose of the amendment at all. I think the amendment was offered to kill the bill in its entirety.

I have in my hand certain cards, mimeographed postcards, that were sent to me when I introduced the original Finnish loan bill. The cards all protest granting a loan to Finland. I went to considerable trouble in having the names of the senders of these cards checked. These cards were sent to my office by known Communists. As I listened to some of the arguments on the question of this foreign loan I was amazed by the similarity of these arguments and the Communist protests I received. May I quote:

I wish to express opposition to your proposed $60,000,000 loan to Finland. It would be more proper for you to take action against the war budget. I am actuated by my desire to keep our Nation out of the war and consider your championing of foreign loans the first step toward our involvement.

That is what the Communists have to say against a loan to Finland. I ask you, Is not the same identical argument, are not the same identical words being used here today by Members of the House who would oppose this loan to Finland? Let me read from another one of these cards:

You propose a $60,000,000 loan to Finland. I am opposed to such foreign loans as a step toward involvement of our Nation in the present war.

That communistic inspired propaganda is a sample of the opposition to an unrestricted loan.

On the other hand, I have here a petition that came from good, honest, loyal American citizens who are interested in the actual loaning of money to Finland and to help Finland out, and also interested in favor of this Export-Import Bank bill.

Let me read you the letter which accompanied this petition.

PELKIE, MICH., February 21, 1940.

Hon. FRANK E. HOOK,
Member of United States House of Representatives,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We, the undersigned, wish to express our heartfelt appreciation of your favorable attitude toward Finland, in the matter of extending her financial aid. We know you agree with us that the Finns are shedding their blood in a heroic battle to prevent Russia from invading their country, and enslaving their people in the throes of Stalinism. Stalinism is the present grave threat to civilization, and Russia, in this respect, is avowedly a common enemy of all democracies; of governments "of the people, for the people, by the people." If we deny Finland aid in her struggle for life, we are aiding Russia in crushing her, and strengthening her to conquer other little nations, and eventually the United States too; because her program is confessedly world-wide Sovietism.

The purpose of this petition from people who are your constituents, is to most ardently appeal for your utmost cooperation in trying to get a substantial loan for Finland, not for food and clothing only but for munitions too, because without such aid she is doomed to destruction. To make Finland a loan without restrictions as to the use of the money, would be no more a breach of neutrality than it is to sell Russia gasoline in enormous quantities, with which to bomb Finnish civilians, hospitals, and churches; but on the contrary, it would be rendering a great service for humanity.

For God's sake, let us all unite in stopping the Russian bear from thrusting her bloody claws deeper in the flesh of innocent women and children.

A loan to Finland will help to stop Russia. If we do not provide pebbles for David's sling to stop Goliath in his brutal effort to destroy an honorable, peace-loving, democratic, friendly nation, Finland, we should bow our heads in shame. Neutrality would be no cloak to cover our heartless attitude toward the suffering of our fellow men, especially when Finland's victory would be our victory, too, and that of many other nations who are dreading the fate of Finland in respect to Russia.

It must be readily conceded that Finland is continuing the World War "to make the world safe for democracy," and as an ally in the World War for that great cause, it is the duty of the United States to give Finland financial aid, especially when she is not asking for men but only for a comparatively small war loan. Isn't it a shame to deny Finland the munitions, when she is willing to do the fighting without our manpower? If dictators emerge from this struggle, then our Revolutionary War, our Civil War, and our World War have been fought in vain, as far as the present and future generations are concerned. Finland is asking for a loan to shield herself from the inhuman brutalities of Stalin and his destructive forces; not as the aggressor nation, as is well known.

War is terrible in any case; but "Give us liberty or give us death" is the attitude of the Finns, and if other democratic nations join her in the same spirit, "governments of the people, for the people, and by the people, shall not perish from the earth."

In the name of justice, in the name of Christianity, and everything it stands for, let us not procrastinate in this matter until it is too late to help Finland.

Our President, too, recently expressed the opinion that 98 percent of the American public are in sympathy with Finland in their war. We dare contend that very few, if any, truly fear that a war loan to Finland would drag us into the conflict to the extent of sending men overseas. In view of our condemnation of Russia for her invasion of Finland, it surely would neither be political suicide to help Finland in her tribulation.

We beseech you, dear Mr. HOOK, to enlist still greater energy in behalf of Finland in her efforts to obtain a direct war loan from the United States. Needless to say, not only the following petitioners but millions of others in America and in other countries who are living in dread of Russia will be deeply grateful for your efforts in this vital matter which concerns us all.

Respectfully submitted in behalf of

PELKIE FINLAND RELIEF COMMITTEE,
MATT OJA, Chairman.

I just want to show you this petition. For instance, there is an illustration of it. These are real American citizens. Any Member who argues against all foreign loans through the Export-Import Bank, or any legitimate loan, to eligible nations has definitely and positively used the same argument the Communists are using on the cards sent to my office and other offices of the Members of this House.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MILLER] for 3 minutes.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this amendment, if I may safely do so without having my motives impugned. In the heat of debate it was charged by my chairman that I introduced my amendment because there are in my district munition manufacturers and aircraft manufacturers. I readily admit that both industries exist in my district, but I want the RECORD to show that during the special session I voted to continue the arms embargo that would have raised havoc with some of the largest industries in my district. I regret exceedingly that my friend from Missouri [Mr. WILLIAMS], acting chairman of my own committee and a man whose fairness I have admired, should have seen fit to question the sincerity of purpose that was mine when I offered the amendment just defeated.

No Member has yet stood in the Well of this House and told us how it could be neutral for Mr. Jones to make a loan through the Export-Import Bank to Finland, but be unneutral for this Congress to indicate its desire that Mr. Jones make such loan.

I would gladly vote today for a bill that would place a definite embargo on all arms, munitions, and implements of war to any country at any time and under any condition. I would stop all loans to any country until our own Budget is balanced and all our own people properly fed, housed, and clothed, while gainfully employed; but this Congress and this Government, in its wisdom, has declared that our policy shall be to ship such munitions. I yield to the will of the majority, not only the majority of this House, but the will of the majority party. I do urge, however, that if we are going to furnish arms, munitions, and implements of war to the Russian Government in the prosecution of its attack on Finland, we should render this aid to the victim of the aggressor—the grand little republic of Finland. [Applause.]

To the gentleman from Kentucky, who preceded me, I will say: I have not changed my position. I stand on what I said during the neutrality debate. I would still keep out of Europe's quarrels if this Congress had permitted us to keep out and not insisted on a program of buying gold, thus making it possible for Russia to maintain her war machine. I hope the gentleman will also remember these words, as long as he has remembered my words spoken last October. I say to him that if we refuse to respond to the appeal of Finland now, but sit idly by and see Russia destroy liberty, freedom, and religion, we can hang our heads in shame as we inspect the ruins of Finland.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut has expired; all time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FISH) there were—ayes 35, noes 82.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. If there are no further amendments, under the rule the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. PARSONS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill H. R. 3069, pursuant to House Resolution 398, he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentlewoman from Illinois opposed to the bill?

Miss SUMNER of Illinois. I am.

The SPEAKER. The gentlewoman qualifies. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Miss SUMNER of Illinois moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Banking and Currency with instructions to that committee to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment: On page 1, line 5, after the word "thereof", strike out "$200,000,000" and insert "$120,000,000."

Mr. WILLIAMS of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The motion to recommit was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CRAWFORD) there were—ayes 168, noes 51.

So the bill was passed.

By unanimous consent, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOOK]?

There was no objection.

PAN AMERICAN AIRWAYS

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. RANDOLPH]?

There was no objection.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago there was introduced in the other legislative body a bill by Senator CLARK of Missouri which proposes to amend section 2 of the Neutrality Act of 1939 in such a manner as to forbid the landing in Bermuda of any aircraft transporting United States mail.

BERMUDA STOP IS CANCELED

In news stories yesterday, as an almost automatic response to the legislative intent of S. 3360, there was an announcement by Pan American Airways that the scheduled Bermuda stop on the east-bound trip to Europe would be omitted. These two actions were precipitated by the unneighborly interference on the part of British censors with the free dispatch of the United States mails.

The United States is a neutral nation. We have legislatively declared our policy of neutrality. We intend, however, that our policy shall be effectuated without the sacrifice of any of our rights and privileges as a neutral nation. It is hardly understandable, therefore, why aircraft of American registry should be subjected to search and seizure, which amounts to a flagrant violation of a neutral's rights.

INVASION OF PEACEFUL RIGHTS

We fully realize that Bermuda is a British possession and that Great Britain is at war. But no legitimate conduct of war can justify an invasion of the right to peaceful pursuit of commerce. The intervention of British censors in this case is clearly an illegal and unwarranted abrogation of the code of international law.

The decision of Pan American Airways apparently avoids the development of a situation which might have had serious consequences. As an advocate of the peaceful method for the settlement of all disputes, I am happy that such a simple expedient is corrective of that situation. Yet the implications of the wrong inflicted upon the sovereignty of the United States are not diminished one iota.

The storm of outraged indignation which followed the incident should serve as a warning that this Nation will not tolerate any meddling interference with its right to free international intercourse. The channels of unfettered communication should not be polluted with the backwash of a foreign war to which we have assumed a position of strict neutrality.

WILL PROTECT OUR COUNTRY

We have pledged ourselves to the proposition that the Western Hemisphere shall remain inviolate, and we should take every legitimate means to let Great Britain, or any other belligerent nation, know that we intend to keep that pledge. [Applause.]

RECOGNITION OF CIVILIAN NURSES

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Speaker, on February 9, the bill (H. R. 8394) to provide for suitable recognition of the voluntary services of civilian nurses with the Army during the influenza epidemic was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures. It has been the practice of the Congress to consider these measures through the Committee on Military Affairs, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that the bill may be rereferred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOMERS]?

There was no objection.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks on the subject of pollution and to include therein certain quotations and editorials.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MUNDT]?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend the remarks I made in Committee today and to include certain excerpts in connection therewith.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN]?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RICH. How long will the House be in session today before the special orders are taken up?

The SPEAKER. The Chair, in the first place, does not think that is a parliamentary inquiry and, in the second place, could not answer it if it were.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I want to serve on the Committee on Appropriations, of which I am a member. I do not care to stay here if we are going to have general debate; and if the House remains in session until after 5 o'clock, I do not want to make my speech this afternoon.

The SPEAKER. The nearest the Chair can come to guessing at a correct answer to the inquiry is to suggest that if the gentleman will remain in the Chamber for a few minutes he will find out what the House is going to do.

AMENDMENT OF BONNEVILLE PROJECT ACT

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H. R. 7270) to amend the Bonneville Project Act, and I ask unanimous consent that the statement may be read in lieu of the report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GAVAGAN]?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand this is a conference report on the Bonneville project bill, and that it is the unanimous agreement of the conferees. There are no controversial features to it?

Mr. GAVAGAN. The gentleman is correct.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 7270) to amend the Bonneville Project Act, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

The Assistant Administrator shall perform the duties and exercise the powers of the Administrator, in the event of the absence or sickness of the Administrator until such absence or sickness shall cease, and, in the event of a vacancy in the office of Administrator until a successor is appointed.'

"SEC. 2. Section 2 (a) of said Act is hereby further amended by adding at the end of said section the following:

" 'The office of the Administrator of the Bonneville project is hereby constituted an office of the Department of the Interior and shall be under the jurisdiction and control of the Secretary of the Interior. All functions vested in the Administrator of the Bonneville project under this Act may be exercised by the Secretary of the Interior and, subject to his supervision and direction, by the Administrator and other personnel of the project.'

"SEC. 3. Section 4 (b) of the said chapter is hereby amended by striking out the words and figures 'January 1, 1941' wherever they occur therein and by substituting in lieu thereof the words and figures 'January 1, 1942'."

And the Senate agree to the same.

WAR DEPARTMENT CIVIL FUNCTIONS APPROPRIATION BILL, 1941

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8668) making appropriations for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1941, for civil functions administered by the War Department, and for other purposes; and pending that motion, I should like to come to an agreement with the ranking minority member of the committee, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. POWERS], with regard to time for general debate. I suggest that general debate run throughout the day and that we then read the first paragraph of the bill, and read the bill for amendment tomorrow.

Mr. POWERS. Is the time to be equally divided?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. POWERS. I believe 1 hour will cover all the requests I have on this side. I just want to make it absolutely positive that we will not read the bill under the 5-minute rule today but will read only the first paragraph, and that debate under the 5-minute rule will be in order starting tomorrow.

Mr. SNYDER. That is very satisfactory.

Mr. POWERS. That is satisfactory to me, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate run throughout the day, the time to be equally divided and controlled by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. POWERS] and myself, and that at the conclusion of the general debate today the first paragraph of the bill be read.

Mr. PARSONS. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania about what time he expects to get the bill to a vote tomorrow afternoon?

Mr. SNYDER. That will all depend on how many amendments will be offered and what occurs during the debate under the 5-minute rule. I may say that I do not expect the consideration of the bill tomorrow to take over an hour or an hour and a half.

Mr. PARSONS. Does the gentleman expect the House to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow, as it has done heretofore this week?

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. If the gentleman will yield, I will answer that question. I am not going to permit that tomorrow. We are going to come in at the regular hour tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield so that I may submit a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. SNYDER. I yield.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that in lieu of the time allotted me this afternoon I may be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes on Monday next, at the conclusion of the legislative program of the day and following any special orders heretofore entered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H. R. 8668.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8668, with Mr. BOEHNE in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, looking at the bottom of the front page of our report, you will see that the Budget performed a major operation in arriving at the amounts submitted for appropriation for the objects embraced by this bill.

As opposed to current expenditures aggregating $305,125,384, the Budget submitted estimates footing up to $220,082,250. That is a cut of 28 percent. The great bulk of the money carried by this bill appears under three purposes or objects—rivers and harbors, flood control, and the Panama Canal. There we must look for any appreciable curtailment of Budget estimates.

Of the total Budget estimate of $220,082,250, but $5,632,193, or about 2½ percent, applies to other than the three major objects I have mentioned.

The bill we present to you proposes appropriations totaling $203,472,567. That is a reduction under the Budget of $16,609,683—a committee cut of about 7½ percent. It is a reduction under current appropriations of $101,652,817, or practically 33⅓ percent. We have left intact the total amounts included in the Budget for river and harbor improvement work and for flood control, with the exception of a $700,000 dredging project under the former.

For river and harbor improvement work the current appropriation is $51,000,000. The Budget includes $25,000,000 for such purposes for 1941. That is a reduction of 51 percent. With the exception of two projects—a $750,000 dredging project in the Delaware River and a $700,000 dredging project at Wake Island—the whole of the $25,000,000 estimate is allocated to projects now under way. It would be out of line with good engineering practice and economic procedure to suspend such work or to provide for a lesser degree of progress.

We are recommending the estimate, with the exception of the Wake Island project, such island being a stop on the trans-Pacific aviation route, which embraces Honolulu, Midway, Wake, and Guam, in the order stated. The Midway development is going forward, but the House has turned down Guam and it has twice refused to go forward with the authorization of the naval aviation base at Wake. The dredging project, while a part of the base program, would be of value to commercial aviation. Wake Island is being used now by trans-Pacific commercial planes. True, difficulty is experienced in landing stores and supplies, but, owing to the tie-in of the project with the held-up naval program, we felt that we should not recommend its prosecution at this time.

For river and harbor maintenance functions the Budget proposes a reduction of $1,226,950 in the current-year allocation of $45,000,000. We are recommending a further reduction of $1,351,540. Practically all of it would seem to be justified by prior-year expenditures. The details of our reduction appear at the bottom of page 3 of our report.

For flood control, general, the Budget proposes a 47 percent reduction. The current appropriation is $133,000,000 and the estimate is $70,000,000. Of the $70,000,000, $64,584,200 is allocated to the prosecution of projects under way.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield on this question of flood control?

Mr. SNYDER. For a brief question.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman is familiar with the request of the engineers for $206,000,000 to prosecute this flood-control work in the next year?

Mr. SNYDER. I am very familiar with it, because about 40 of my colleagues have come before the committee and asked for $133,000,000.

Mr. MOTT. Will the gentleman tell us what progress the Army engineers can make in the direction of completing this national flood-control program, the expenses for which in the current year have been placed at a minimum of $206,000,000, when the amount carried in this bill is only $70,000,000 and only $58,000,000 of that can be used for expenditure?

Mr. SNYDER. I shall be pleased to comment upon that as soon as I have completed my general statement, if the gentleman will permit.

The difference between the $70,000,000 and the $64,584,200 is made up of $4,500,000 for examinations and surveys by the War Department and the Department of Agriculture, and the rest is for maintenance and certain contingent expenses.

The $64,000,000 plus, as I stated, is all on account of projects under way. The Engineer Corps is prepared to proceed with projects which would require a total appropriation of $206,624,000. On account of authorized projects there remains to be appropriated roundly $418,000,000. Because of the pressing need for economy, we have felt constrained not to add to the Budget estimate, and, in view of the large Budget reduction, we gave no serious thought to further curtailment. To prolong this work unduly would be unsound from any point of view. Property losses from floods in the past run into astronomical figures. Human lives by the thousands have been snuffed out by rushing floodwaters in every section of the country. Losses have not been local. They are reflected in the national economy, in the national wealth, and corrective measures should be prosecuted with as much dispatch as our finances will allow.

There was considerable sentiment in the committee that some part of the appropriation definitely should be available for undertaking new projects. If there were no departure from the engineers' allocation, that would not be practicable. Consequently we have attached to the appropriation—page 8, line 6, of the bill—a provision that in effect definitely reserves $6,458,200 for initiating work on projects now in readiness to be proceeded with.

For continuing flood-control survey work the bill provides $3,000,000 for the engineers and $2,000,000 for the Department of Agriculture. The latter amount represents a $500,000 increase in the estimate and will have to come from objects other than new work, as the earmarked amount I have mentioned is exclusively for new work.

Mr. MOTT. If the gentleman will yield, he has now concluded the item about which I inquired. The gentleman said that when he concluded with that he would answer my question.

We have available this year for flood control, if no larger appropriation is made than that recommended by the committee, an amount not exceeding one-half as much as we had last year for work on that program. How does the gentleman believe this national program for flood control will ever be completed if we are to have appropriations for that purpose no larger than this?

Mr. SNYDER. At a certain place in the hearings the gentleman will observe that I asked the Army Engineers to insert figures regarding the money appropriated for flood control each year for the last 15 years.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman knows we have had no national flood-control program except since 1938.

Mr. SNYDER. For the same period I asked for river and harbor appropriations. If the gentleman will look at that table, he will observe that during the last 4 or 5 years or 3 or 4 years the Government has been very, very generous in its appropriations for flood-control work.

Mr. MOTT. That is because since 1938 the expenditures for flood control have been larger than prior to 1938.

Mr. SNYDER. Yes; very much larger.

Mr. MOTT. The reason for that is that in 1938 we passed a general flood-control authorization bill, and in that bill declared it to be the policy of the Congress to enter upon this national program for the control of floods, and we authorized and appropriated a certain amount of money to do so. We have less than half as much this year for that program as we had last year. If these reductions keep on, how does the gentleman believe we will ever complete that program?

Mr. SNYDER. We intend to pursue that program as soon as our finances will permit. I may say to the gentleman—but the gentleman understands—that the Budget has to be cut something like half a billion dollars in order to stay under the $45,000,000,000 debt limit. This committee felt it was its duty to do its part toward accomplishing that reduction, and I may say as to the flood-control estimate that it is confined to projects under way. No work will have to be suspended. That is, for example, work on a dam that has been started will not be stopped and left subject to the action of the elements; they would go on and complete it. Furthermore, I might say that history shows that floods of major importance occur only about once every 8 years, and that superfloods occur only about once every 24 years. Therefore, there may be 4 or 5 years yet before we can look for a flood such as we had in 1936–37, which may be some warrant for not trying to do the whole job as speedily as some would like to see.

Mr. MOTT. The gentleman believes we may have the program well under way by the time the next superflood appears, which he says will be 24 years from now?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I yield to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. In Massachusetts we had a superflood in 1936 and had a very large flood in 1938, which would have been very much worse if they had not done some work as a result of the 1936 flood. In 1938 they had freshets or high water almost every month of the year.

Mr. SNYDER. You have a lot of work started up there now, have you not?

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Some work has been done on the reservoir at Franklin Falls, but more work is needed and has been recommended there and elsewhere. Is there anything in the bill for an additional reservoir in the Merrimack River?

Mr. SNYDER. I would say that if one is already started it will be carried on. If it has not been started, there is $6,000,000 to start work on projects that are to be selected by the Army engineers in the order of their priority of need.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. But the location has not been specified in this bill.

Mr. SNYDER. No; no locations for any new work have been selected yet.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Is there also any money for local protection? The reservoirs will not begin to protect the towns in the Merrimack Valley if the dams are built for power.

Mr. SNYDER. I did not understand that.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. If the dams are built for power they will need local flood protection along the Merrimack Valley in order to afford flood protection, and I assume they will be built for power.

Mr. SNYDER. It will be up to the Army engineers to determine where this $6,000,000 will be used for the commencement of projects of any kind.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. And it may be used for local flood protection as well as for dams?

Mr. SNYDER. Oh, surely.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I yield.

Mr. HINSHAW. Last year, I believe, there was a letter sent to some Member of the House, perhaps to the gentleman now in the Well of the House, from the President, saying that if the bill was passed as it was offered to the House, that $50,000,000 additional would be subscribed from the Work Projects Administration fund for the prosecution of flood-control work.

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. HINSHAW. Has the gentleman any intimation of such an allotment for this coming year?

Mr. SNYDER. I have not.

Mr. HINSHAW. Does the gentleman have any idea that such an allotment will be offered from the Work Projects Administration?

Mr. SNYDER. I have not. I have not taken it up with anybody and no one has spoken to me about it.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I yield.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. In regard to the break-down of the figures for the Corps of Engineers in connection with new work, there is a break-down of $750,000 for initiation of work in the Delaware River.

Mr. SNYDER. That is right.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. Is it the opinion of the Army engineers that that sum is sufficient for the ensuing fiscal year?

Mr. SNYDER. It is.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. That is all they will need?

Mr. SNYDER. That is all they will need for the ensuing fiscal year.

Mr. BRADLEY of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SNYDER. The Panama Canal is the third and final major item in the bill. For the support and operation of the existing establishment the Budget allows $10,277,077. For the current year the appropriations amounted to $10,574,994. We have added $28,236 to the Budget reduction of $297,917, all of our reduction growing out of suggestions of Governor Ridley.

The current appropriation act carries $14,200,000 and contractual authority of $2,300,000 toward the provision of means of protecting the existing waterway, estimated to cost, in all, $39,570,000.

For going forward with that program the Budget includes $19,000,000 and further contractual authority of $4,500,000. This would leave for future appropriation $6,370,000. We are recommending the Budget estimate. I may say that that item of contractual authority is the only one in the bill. We eliminated the other request, a matter of $99,300,000, which I shall refer to in a moment. We recommend contractual authority in this instance because the equivalent in money will not be needed for expenditure during the ensuing fiscal year, and contractual authority would facilitate completion through the avoidance of delaying obligations until after June 30, 1941. This is considered to be in line with good engineering and business practice. Moreover, the project is generally recognized as of such importance and urgency that there should be no hindrance thrown in the way of its orderly and early consummation.

That brings me to the new Panama Canal proposal—the source of about 85 percent of the total amount we recommend be disallowed of the Budget estimates.

By the act approved last August 11, authority was granted for the construction of a bypass and new set of locks, to cost $277,000,000. In consequence of such authority the Budget proposes an initial appropriation of $15,000,000 and contractual authority of $99,300,000. Commencement is advocated at this time as an urgent defense measure, although completion of the work is not planned until 6 years hence, at the earliest. The need for additional locks for shipping, it is estimated, will not occur before 1960. The proposition is to launch upon this vast project even before a start has been made to prepare detailed plans and specifications for accomplishing the structural features, and we were told that it will take 2 years to complete such plans and specifications.

Our feeling is that the project is being pushed too rapidly. Its early commencement is advanced as an urgent defense need, but a project that cannot be completed for 6 years is difficult to get excited about. Bear in mind that we are going ahead as rapidly as possible with protective works around existing Canal facilities. That work probably should be proceeded with with dispatch. The proposed new bypass and locks, not needed for commercial shipping for another 20 years, would provide an auxiliary waterway closely paralleling the present one. The close proximity of the two robs the proposed auxiliary of much of its security value. It would be equally susceptible of damage, equally vulnerable.

Our judgment is that commencement should be deferred for the present, at least. In the meantime work could be going forward on the structural plans and specifications, estimated to cost $1,591,900. We are recommending $850,000 of that amount.

I have accounted for our action as to the major items in the bill. We have effected a number of reductions in the estimate for cemeterial expenses, all amounting to $77,407. These are explained in the report. We also refused a request of $300,000 for enlarging the capacity of existing buildings at the local soldiers' home to accommodate the estimated growth in membership. We are not impressed with the need for such expansion at this time.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, may I say that I realize that this bill is disappointing to many of our colleagues as to certain of its phases of which the Corps of Engineers has cognizance. No doubt a similar feeling has been engendered by certain curtailments in other appropriation measures which previously have been presented to the House. However regrettable as that may be, I am sure most of us are agreed that the end we seek justified the economies we are endeavoring to effect, and I trust that this measure, drafted with the same end in view, may have your support.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I yield to my friend from Virginia.

Mr. BLAND. Was it not stated that the $15,000,000 was needed for work that would go on contemporaneously with the preparation of plans and would be necessary for the complete prosecution of the work in 6 years?

Mr. SYNDER. The $15,000,000 is a part of the program.

Mr. BLAND. Was not the statement made that the entire amount of $15,000,000 would be needed and the failure to appropriate the $15,000,000 at this time simply means that the Committee assumes the responsibility, against the judgment of the President and everybody else that for national-defense purposes these locks should be provided at the earliest possible moment?

Mr. SNYDER. I would not say that the Committee is assuming responsibility; we are presenting a recommendation to the House.

Mr. BLAND. There is no escape from it.

Mr. SNYDER. I would not say that.

Mr. COLLINS. Governor Ridley said it would take at least 2 years to complete the plans, and it would seem to me to be foolish to begin any kind of construction work until the plans are completed.

Mr. BLAND. I submit to the gentleman that the evidence shows that the plans were to be contemporaneous with the necessary acquisition of land, construction of plant, and preparation necessary for excavation, to provide these locks so much needed.

Mr. COLLINS. On page 3 of the hearings Governor Ridley testified that for the locks it would take probably a couple of years to complete the plans.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. I yield to my friend from New York.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I did not quite understand what the gentleman said about the amount available for the construction of the bypass on the Panama Canal. How much is to be available?

Mr. SNYDER. As was said by my colleague, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS], Governor Ridley testified it would take about 2 years to complete the plans, and they asked for $1,500,000 to complete those plans and specifications in the next 2 years, and the committee gave them more than half, $850,000 for the next year, to work on those plans.

Mr. CULKIN. Our advices in the Merchant Marine Committee before the bill came out were that the plans, of course, were complete.

Mr. SNYDER. Oh, no; it would take about 2 years to complete them.

Mr. BLAND. That is the general plans, but not the detail plans.

Mr. CULKIN. And the committee made available $850,000?

Mr. SNYDER. For the plans.

Mr. CULKIN. Going back to the item for river and harbor maintenance: That amount is sixty-six-million-seven-hundred-thousand-and-odd dollars. Was that amount cut below the Budget estimate?

Mr. SNYDER. No; not for new work.

Mr. CULKIN. Was that the exact Budget estimate?

Mr. SNYDER. No.

Mr. TERRY. There was one item of $700,000 for dredging at Wake Island. That is in the Budget, and that is cut out.

Mr. CULKIN. That is one of the three items mentioned in the report?

Mr. TERRY. Seven hundred thousand dollars was carried in the Budget for Wake Island. The committee cut that out.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make an observation. I think this river and harbor work and these waterways are performing a most important service to the Nation and that they are of great importance to the continuance of industry and agriculture. I hope the committee will bear that in mind when the country comes upon better circumstances, and that the committee will then make appropriations commensurate with the importance of the service performed.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman wants to be entirely fair in his presentation of what Governor Ridley said. I read from the hearings:

> So we present a budget under which we could do this work in about 6 years. Of course, the locks did not have to be designed at the beginning, because the contracts for them would not be made until the excavation had been finished, so by putting on a larger designing force we figured we could finish the work in 2 years.

Was not Governor Ridley there referring to plans for the locks, and the $15,000,000 which was asked for in the Budget is to do the excavation and other work necessary to the construction of the locks, and the plans would then be available in 2 years?

Mr. SNYDER. Since my colleague the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] is so well versed in these matters, I ask him to answer that question.

Mr. COLLINS. It is my understanding that it will take about 2 years to complete the plans for the locks and all other plans of a general nature on the Canal. I am certain that we ought not to appropriate any money for excavation and for other purposes down there until we find out more about where the money will be expended than we know now.

Mr. BLAND. The distinguished gentleman does not deny the statement of General Ridley?

Mr. COLLINS. General Ridley states:

> These plans we have made so far and the investigations relate principally to the foundation and general outline of the lay-out of the lock structures.

Now, he also couples that with the statement that for the locks it will take probably a couple of years to complete the plan. As I understand the testimony, the plans other than for the locks have not yet been considered to any large extent.

Mr. BLAND. If the gentleman had gone a little further, he would have found that this work could go ahead for the $15,000,000, while the plans for the locks are being designed.

Mr. COLLINS. I realize that they want to get the $15,000,000, but we just did not feel that they should have the $15,000,000 until plans had been made upon which we could justify estimates of appropriation.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman realizes that this is for national defense?

Mr. COLLINS. No. I do not take it that it is for military defense, because it will take at least 6 years to construct these additional locks after their construction has been begun. It is the uncontroverted testimony that the existing Canal facilities are ample, under all shipping estimates, until 1960, which is 20 years hence.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY].

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to address myself to an item on page 8 of the bill, and the report of the committee contained on page 4, having to do with the $70,000,000 appropriation for flood control throughout the United States.

We of New England naturally feel that there is a great emergency existing there to carry out the work that has been designated, in order to prevent, as far as man can, a repetition of the terrible floods we had in that area in 1938 and previously.

I, for one, want to commend the attitude of the Department, the Board of Engineers, and the committee in the assignments that have been made and the relative division of the $70,000,000.

I find on page 4 of the report reference to the projects in New England. The first two have to do with the conditions on the Merrimack River Basin, which is represented by my colleague the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS], which show appropriations for carrying on the work on Franklin Falls Reservoir and the Merrimack River Basin. The next three items have to do with flood control in the district I represent, Surry Mountain Reservoir, Connecticut River Basin; Birch Hill Reservoir, Connecticut River Basin; and Knightville Reservoir, Connecticut River Basin. All three of those are provided with definite sums that can be advantageously used during the year 1941. Therefore there is an element of satisfaction on the part of the people that I represent as to the attitude of the Department and of the committee.

I want to clear up, however, for the satisfaction of my constituents, one idea which I think has arisen because of a misinterpretation of a press item which was confusing to the people of Holyoke, in that they thought that a project for the protection of the southern portion of the city could be included in this bill. I received this morning a telegram from the secretary of the Chamber of Commerce in Holyoke, as follows:

Failure to appropriate funds to carry on local flood-protective works in the south area of Holyoke will leave this important industrial section of this city in a desperate situation. Urge renewed effort to provide for the completion of the entire Holyoke project.

That was signed by Mr. Conrad Hemond, secretary of the Holyoke Chamber of Commerce. In that connection I would like to read my reply to that telegram, sent this afternoon:

Replying your telegram, have just conferred with Office of Chief of Engineers, which states pending appropriation bill has no connection with work on lower flooded area in Holyoke. This particular project has been surveyed by engineers under Colonel Bragdon, and special report from War Department will be sent to Congress in very near future requesting necessary authority to do this work. It is hoped this project may be included in authorization bill which Chairman WHITTINGTON hopes to report during present session. Additional appropriation then will be necessary, as funds contained in pending bill cannot be applied to work not heretofore authorized by Congress. Letter from Chief of Engineers explaining matter in detail will be forwarded to Mayor Toepfert in day or two. Am following matter up closely and will do everything possible to end that entire Holyoke flood-protection work may be completed earliest possible date.

ALLEN T. TREADWAY, M. C.

I bring this to the attention of the House in order that my constituents may have a definite idea that this particular protection in the lower part of the city of Holyoke cannot possibly be included in this bill, as requested by the chamber of commerce. That will follow in the natural course, after the engineers' report has been submitted and has been accepted by the Congress. As I said in the telegram, I hope that this project may be definitely agreed to in the bill that undoubtedly the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTINGTON], chairman of the Flood Control Committee, will submit during the present session of Congress. It is well understood by this committee that the first step in any flood-control project is favorable action upon the engineers' survey.

In conclusion, I appreciate that I have taken up the time of the House in referring to a somewhat local matter, but one of great interest to my constituents, and therefore of importance to me as their Representative.

Let me again commend the committee for the manner in which they have allocated, under the direction of the engineers, the amount of the $70,000,000 for the definite work of flood control throughout the United States.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE].

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, my admiration for the clerks of the Appropriations Committee was increased in the consideration of this bill. Mr. John Pugh, the regular clerk assigned to this subcommittee for War Department appropriations, was sick and in the hospital shortly before we started hearings. Mr. George Harvey, clerk to other important subcommittees, sat in for him, however, arranged for witnesses, assembled our data, and the work of the committee went on in splendid shape. Mr. Pugh returned just before we marked up the bill and helped us at that point. This bill, therefore, has been prepared with the efficient help of two members of the clerical staff of the Committee on Appropriations; and here again, as in the consideration of all appropriation bills, we find that their services are indispensable and of the highest order. [Applause.]

LOCKS, LAND BASES, AND CANAL DEFENSE

I want to speak for a few minutes with respect to the lock situation at Panama and its bearing upon the subject of national defense, and to read to you a very short concurrent resolution I propose to place in the hopper this afternoon.

I am among those who seriously question the immediate value from a defensive standpoint of the proposed third set of locks. Because of this it has seemed to me appropriate at this time to focus attention upon a matter which has been suggested at various times by various people, and that is the acquisition of land bases that would really contribute to the defense of the Canal, really contribute to the defense of the Western Hemisphere, and do it more quickly, more economically, and more efficiently than building a third set of locks.

In our hearings we had testimony from representatives from the Canal Zone and from the War Department staff. I want to call your attention to the testimony of Governor Ridley on page 3.

The senior minority member of the committee the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. POWERS] was asking Governor Ridley about the location of the proposed locks. Governor Ridley replied that the new locks would be about a quarter of a mile away from existing locks on the Pacific side, and on the Atlantic side would be half a mile away from existing locks. This suggested to some of us that if these proposed new locks were to be within half or quarter of a mile of existing locks, that they would be just as vulnerable to attack as the existing locks.

NEW LOCKS ALSO WOULD BE TARGETS

As a matter of fact, a plane flying high at 300 or 400 miles an hour, or even 150 or 200 miles an hour is lucky if any great number of its bombs strike that close to a target. Many of them would be just as likely to hit a quarter or half a mile away from the point aimed at as to hit the point itself. The exact spot a bomb strikes when dropped from a ship going 5 miles a minute is as much a matter of accident as of marksmanship. If the existing locks, therefore, are vulnerable to attack, so would be a new set of locks built within a quarter or half a mile of the existing ones.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. COLLINS. In that connection, it is a well-known fact that when the Germans sent their bombing forces into Poland they were far from being accurate. The reason they made so many hits was because they sent so many planes and dropped so many bombs that they could not help but make hits. So a bombing operation against the Panama Canal by an enemy nation, if such could occur, would just as likely strike one set of locks as another, or maybe both.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I think the gentleman is right. His observation with respect to the situation in Poland suggests another thing. Everyone who has fired on a rifle range knows that the greater the distance from the target the more time is required for accuracy. Rapid fire is used only on the short ranges. Slow fire at short range is deadly if permitted. The same thing is true in the air. A moving plane which is more or less unpursued is much more able to hit its target than a plane which is harassed or harried by pursuit planes. This leads me to the conclusion that the development of proper land bases offer much better defense than the building of another set of locks, which would simply offer another target.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. RANDOLPH. The gentleman, I am sure, would not want to leave the impression on the Committee that he feels that the advent or the innovation of bombing planes in modern warfare is not of paramount importance.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. No. I am coming to that point. I believe that the efficiency of bombing planes calls for a proper basing of defending pursuit planes. We need bases for the operation of pursuit planes against attacking planes and for the operation of defense bombing planes against possible enemy ships at sea. Our object should be to keep the enemy from reaching the target rather than giving him another target.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. BLAND. Does the gentleman subscribe to the doctrine, then, that the Appropriations Committee can just dispense with any work on the part of a legislative committee and where a matter has been seriously considered by a legislative committee and has been duly enacted by the Congress that it is not binding on the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I subscribe to the theory that if the Appropriations Committee were to make appropriations for every authorization passed by Congress at the recommendation of a legislative committee, that it would mean the bankruptcy of the Nation immediately. As between the several appeals for funds, we have to strike a balance. As between two courses of action for the same objective, we must ask which will give the most for the money available.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield.

Mr. SNYDER. I want to make myself clear. Neither I nor any other member of the committee that I know of am opposed to the proper defense of the Panama Canal. We felt in view of the appropriations that were made year before last and last year for national defense, including items for the Panama Canal, that viewed from the standpoint of economics and business procedure this item could be withheld for the time being.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Yes. I would not want to leave the impression that the chairman or that all members of the subcommittee are permanently opposed to the installation of a third set of locks. But I am expressing my own opinion that from a defense consideration we are warranted in taking a further look at the picture.

RESPONSIBILITY OF THE APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE

I recognize that when a legislative committee passes an authorization it does behoove the Appropriations Committee to consider the authorization very carefully. At the same time the Appropriations Committee cannot escape the fundamental responsibility to measure the various authorizations that are made for appropriations and somehow arrive at some sort of balance or adjustment of the various appropriations to be made. It would be impossible to appropriate in full for every authorization that is made by legislative committees.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CULKIN. In connection with the statement the gentleman has just made, would he give due weight to the experts of the Army and Navy and their recommendations?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I would; and for this reason I want to call the gentleman's attention to some expert testimony to be found on page 8 of the hearings. Unless the gentleman wants to pursue his questioning further, I would like to address myself to that matter, because I have a definite proposition to get before the House.

Mr. CULKIN. I want to pursue a little different line of inquiry in regard to the question asked by the gentleman from Mississippi. The story is told that there were some 3,000 bombing planes used in the Polish expedition. Does the gentleman believe that 3,000 German planes could land in the Panama Canal Zone?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I hope not. I do not want to see 3,000 planes from any foreign country even get close to the Canal.

Mr. CULKIN. He does not see that possibility, does he?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. No; not now.

Mr. CULKIN. That is, in this day and age.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. The defense problem of the Panama Canal Zone is essentially a broader thing than just the defense of the Canal Zone itself.

OPEN CANAL INCREASES NAVY'S VALUE

A major argument advanced for the building of a third set of locks is to increase the efficiency of the Navy of the United States in the hope that we might avoid having to build a two-ocean Navy. We want to make our Navy effective and available in both oceans if the demand ever arises. We are seeking to increase the efficiency of the Navy in our consideration of the defense of the Canal Zone. It is not merely the defense of the works but protection of the Canal, so that the Navy may pass from one ocean to another, if necessary.

Mr. CULKIN. Will the gentleman tell the committee how much time his committee spent on that particular question? Our committee spent at least a week on it. How much time did the gentleman's committee spend on that question?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. If the gentleman will consult the hearings he will find many, many pages devoted to the subject, which is an indication of the time spent on it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, the testimony before the committee indicated that under normal procedure it would take at least 10 years to build a third set of locks. It was suggested that under a speed-up program at least 6 years would be required for their construction and $277,000,000 in money. From this standpoint and facing the various problems of defense and the finances that we have, certainly there is no one who will contend that works taking 6 years to complete offer an immediate answer to our defense problems.

BILL CARRIES $39,000,000 FOR PROTECTIVE WORKS

More than that, and referring to a thing which the chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SNYDER], mentioned a few minutes ago, this bill does carry some $39,000,000 in appropriations or contract authorizations for the building of protective works on existing locks. So the committee was not insensible to the need of protective measures for the locks that now exist, and we hope to make those as bombproof as we can.

Mr. Chairman, I will have to refuse to yield further, because I want to proceed to a specific proposition. On page 8 of our hearings you will find a statement prepared by Gen. George V. Strong, Assistant Chief of Staff and the Chief of War Plans, who appeared before us January 29.

This statement was prepared in response to my request and was based on questions which I and other members of the subcommittee asked him. While we did not feel that all of the discussion should be in the record, the statement which is in the record will be of interest to anyone who wants to give this matter serious consideration, and especially to those who have been talking about consulting experts. Bear in mind that General Strong is Assistant Chief of Staff in charge of the War Plans Division.

STATEMENT BY GENERAL STRONG

General Strong's statement reads as follows:

From an academic standpoint, the prevention of air raids on the Panama Canal from either carrier-based aviation or land-based aviation makes it highly desirable that our defensive aircraft cover generally a line whose radius is about 1,000 miles from the Canal Zone. In applying this measure to the defense of the Caribbean, we find that generally, the line of the Lesser Antilles offers the best positions for basing the activities of our defensive air operations. This was one of the factors influencing the United States to set up Puerto Rico as a separate department and provide therein air bases from which our defensive aircraft could operate and from which we could do the necessary scouting and patrolling in the event of an emergency. You will note that Puerto Rico is at the northern end of this arc.

Now follow closely as I quote further—

From a purely military standpoint, it would be of very great advantage in the defense of the Canal if we had another such base located either on the north coast of South America or on some of the southern islands of the Lesser Antilles. In this connection, however, in view of the international questions involved which are essentially those of governmental policy, the War Department can make no recommendation as to the acquisition of land now under foreign control but which, if it belonged to us, might be used for national-defense purposes.

Mr. TERRY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. TERRY. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that our Chief Executive has just gone down to Panama and we have a statement in the morning paper to the effect he is greatly impressed with the need of additional bases there for airplane defense, just as is being suggested by the gentleman.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Yes; I noted that this morning with special interest. Mr. Chairman, continuing, General Strong stated:

The question of the acquisition of such land is primarily a question of foreign relations. The War Department is limited to considering the use of our own territory and can make no recommendation in the premises unless and until so requested by the State Department.

During the special session of Congress this particular proposition came to my attention in various ways. I received a letter from an old friend in Iowa who made a suggestion which is the basis of the resolution I propose to put in the hopper this afternoon. The suggestion is that the United States seek by peaceful means to acquire suitable bases east and west of the Canal Zone by application, if possible, of credits to some of the defaulted foreign debts, and also, if necessary, by use of some of the stock of gold held by the Treasury.

IDEA OF ACQUIRING BASES IS NOT NEW

At the time, with feelings tense on neutrality legislation, I thought that such a proposition might be misunderstood and decided, for my part, not to press it then. The question of appropriations for a third set of locks, however, brings the matter squarely before us, and so I determined to present the proposal in definite form at this time. The basic idea is not particularly new. The gentleman from California [Mr. HAVENNER] introduced a resolution on the 26th of October proposing to authorize negotiations for the acquisition of certain territory in the Western Hemisphere and proposing therein the application of defaulted debts to such acquisition.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 6 additional minutes.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Somewhat similar proposals have been discussed in many magazines, and I lay no claim to originality in presenting a concrete proposal to join the locks and the land base question with the gold and debt problems. The value of outpost land bases was set forth last September in an article by Mr. Charles Weil in the Marine Corps Gazette in which he quoted Admiral Leahy, Admiral Mahan, and Major Eliot, supporting the thesis that the effectiveness of our Navy and the effectiveness of our defensive air forces depend in large part in having outpost bases.

February 7, the Washington Star reviewed an article in the semiofficial United States Naval Institute proceedings by Lt. Comdr. Isaiah Olchs, of the Navy. His proposition was that the United States should accept "foreign naval establishments in the Caribbean as a part payment on the European World War debts."

I make this clear because I am not trying to take any credit for proposing a new idea, but am rather relating it to a specific situation that we confront in this question of whether we shall engage upon a 6-year program of building a third set of locks at a cost of $277,000,000 or whether we shall seek to develop some defensive land bases at a fraction of the cost and in a fraction of the time.

Concretely, I propose today for the consideration of the House a concurrent resolution to read as follows:

PROPOSED CONCURRENT RESOLUTION

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the United States and the Secretary of State are hereby advised that the Congress favors the peaceful acquisition of land bases which in the opinion of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy will facilitate the defense of the Western Hemisphere in general and of the Panama Canal in particular against possible military activity by any non-American powers; and the Secretary of State is hereby requested, in consultation with the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, to investigate and report at the earliest practicable date on the possibility of such acquisition to be paid in part by the payment of gold to be withdrawn from the stabilization fund administered by the Secretary of the Treasury and in part by credits on debts in default where such bases can be acquired from nations in default on debts to the United States.

I shall put the bill in the hopper this afternoon and hope that the committee to which it may be referred will give it early consideration. I also suggest that if any Member of the House wants an interesting evening he acquire a globe or a map of the world and refresh his memory on the various islands east and west of the Panama Canal, as I did last night. You will then visualize the concrete problem seen in the statement of the Assistant Chief of Staff, and I believe you will agree that if the United States had a proper land base in the southern line of the Lesser Antilles and also a base on the west of Panama we would achieve a far more effective defense for the Canal than we would by the building of another target, which is what an additional set of locks would be.

WILL SAVE GENERAL STAFF SOME HEADACHES

I am convinced from the study I have been able to give to this subject that if we did this we would save a lot of headaches for the War Department when it comes to plannings the defense of the Canal.

In reading the proposed concurrent resolution you will note that the proposal to use some of the gold in the stabilization fund and to grant credits on defaulted debts brings in an attack on two other problems of the day.

Foreign debtor nations owe us around $12,000,000,000. If we can get those loans on a current basis and convert the payments into something we need, the proposition would be attractive on that account alone. Addition of the gold feature is suggested to increase the attractiveness of the proposal.

Every Member of the Congress is besieged daily with articles and pamphlets on the gold problem today; or we read headlines about the "Gold crisis that we are facing," or "How our purchases of gold aid Japan or Russia," or "America's golden headache," or "Knotty problem of gold hoard," or "What to do with buried gold."

All of these suggest that if we can approach the problem of a redistribution of gold by doing something that will help to solve a major-defense problem, collect foreign debts, and at the same time save appropriations for propositions of questionable defense value, we will be making a real contribution toward solving problems confronting the country. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ALEXANDER].

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, we do not seem to have a very large audience here this afternoon; but I am wondering how many of the Members have during their lifetime visited the beautiful State of Minnesota. I wish those that have would put up their hands. I see that we have had some visitors up there from the South and the East.

I mentioned this because you who have been there and who are familiar with the beauties that we have in the way of both resources and the more ephemeral beauties such as rolling prairies, blue lakes, and beautiful trees and woodlands are familiar with the fact that we have a wonderful country there with as fertile soil as is to be found anywhere, and great natural resources, but still we have a tremendous relief burden. I have been struck with that fact, and it has resulted in my concentrating my efforts and study on that problem with the idea that when you have everything to do with and still seem to be impotent to contend with the forces with which we have to contend in this particular era under which we are suffering, there must be something wrong back of all this, creating this unfavorable condition.

There is something wrong, and I want to discuss with you for a few minutes this afternoon the picture as I see it up there in our beautiful section of the United States.

We have in Minneapolis approximately 62,000 people unemployed and on relief out of a total population of some 468,000. It seems almost impossible for the human mind to believe that sort of a situation in a land as fertile and as productive as ours in Minnesota. We even have in the farming or rural section of Minnesota 30 percent of the total unemployment of the State, farmers and country people who are unable to make a living from that most fertile soil. Now, why is this? Why, under the name of all that is fair and good, do we have a condition such as that?

When you consider the fact that it costs $5.65 a ton for freight to haul a ton of coal up there under the present set-up, and when you consider the fact that it costs approximately 16 cents a bushel to the farmer, who produces wheat, to ship a bushel of wheat 400 miles to Duluth or to Minneapolis and compare those figures with what the Australian or the Argentine farmer pays in freight for much greater distances, then you may get some idea of why we are in the situation that we are in now.

I want to call the attention of the Members to this fact. You can ship from Argentina, a distance of 7,200 miles, from Buenos Aires to Liverpool, for 13½ cents a bushel, or about $5 per ton, as against about 16 cents a bushel for 400 miles, which is used as a basic figure, for our farmers up there in the Northwest to ship simply to the water. No wonder we cannot sell our surplus crops or have nothing left after paying the freight rate on what we do sell. At 1 cent per ton-mile, the usual railroad freight rate, it would cost the Argentine farmer $72 per ton, or nearly $2 per bushel, to ship his grain to Europe. The result would be no business, like we have suffered in country areas since about 1922.

From Australia to Liverpool, a distance of approximately 15,000 miles, it costs the farmers of Australia approximately the same, 16 cents a bushel, to ship that 15,000 miles, as compared with the 400 miles I have mentioned.

Now, you can get some idea of why we are in the depression that we are in up there. When Minnesota and the Northwestern States could be self-supporting, could be just blooming with prosperity, we are in the slough of despond because of the action of Congress, or, rather, the inaction of Congress, and when I say that I am putting the blame right where it should be put. For years we have been trying to get justice in this matter.

We have been trying to promote an upper-river barge line from St. Louis to Minneapolis; $147,191,000, according to the Army engineers' report, has already been spent to promote this idea of a barge line from St. Louis to Minneapolis. We still lack and need $22,809,000 to complete that project. In other words, we have built a house and have no roof on it, and now we want to put that roof on. So the Army engineers requested of the Budget Bureau, for 1941, $3,845,000 to be spent in the city of Minneapolis in order to start to complete the work that is necessary there in order to give us a harbor at the head of the waterway so that we can ship out and in the produce which we consume and sell. Think of it. Spending $147,000,000 to get to the greatest and second largest city in the midcontinent valley west of the Mississippi with a barge line, and then stop at the city's edge without hooking up with its rail terminals, industry, and markets and wholesale district, where the river highway could be made use of.

But the Budget Bureau turned the Army engineers down; in other words, they instructed the Army engineers to bring in a request for only $25,000,000 instead of $160,000,000, which the engineers report could be used profitably.

I want to read just a few excerpts from the committee hearing to put the blame right where it belongs for this situation. General Schley, Chief of Engineers, was in the committee hearing when the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] said:

When you submit an estimate to the Budget you usually submit the sort of a figure they give you.

General SCHLEY. Yes, sir; we were told by the Budget before we submitted a list that it should total $30,000,000. Then they reduced it to $25,000,000.

Mr. TERRY. I had the impression somehow that you had submitted to the Department an amount of $206,000,000.

General SCHLEY. Perhaps, if you include flood control. This is only for navigation. The flood-control estimate is larger.

Mr. TERRY. Then you submitted to the Budget or to the Department the figure of $30,000,000?

General SCHLEY. At their direction.

Mr. TERRY. Then they cut it down after you submitted that figure to $25,000,000.

General SCHLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. COLLINS. That sounds a little like duress to me.

Of course, it was duress; duress applied at the primary spot; and I want to call the attention of the members here this afternoon to the fact that the Budget Bureau is doing your job for you. They have taken your constitutional rights and prerogatives away from you. They have become the appropriating body of Government. No wonder Hitler called the members of the German Reichstag parliamentary gas bags. No wonder representative government is fast being done away with in the world today. If we do not wake up here and start functioning in accordance with the Constitution, the people will do away with Congress; and if I am not mistaken, the people of this Nation in the final analysis are going to get sick and disgusted paying your salaries to let the Budget Bureau and other commissions do your job for you.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield.

Mr. POWERS. The Budget Bureau is not doing the job for the Appropriations Committee. I think the appropriation bills that have been reported to the House show that we are doing our own job.

Mr. ALEXANDER. All right. General Schley in his request for appropriations asked for 75 different items for rivers and harbors, totaling $73,226,800, and the Budget allowed only 18 of those 75 items without cuts, and your committee took it as dictated and brought the bill to us item for item as dictated except as to one, the appropriation for Wake Island.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. ALEXANDER. In other words, when the committee got the request from the Army engineers they got the decimated request for $25,000,000 instead of the $73,226,800 and every one of those projects in that total is a needful item, an item which will promote the welfare and the interest of this Nation, of the unemployed, the farmers, the laboring men, and the citizenry in general.

Mr. POWERS. Does not the gentleman know that that is the old Army and Navy game—go to the Budget with four times as much as you need, and have it cut down and still get plenty?

Mr. ALEXANDER. No; I do not. I have here before me in this report an entire list made up of a greater number of about 100 projects which have been asked for by different localities, and which the Army engineers have rejected, and they have put in only these seventy-five which, as they say, are the ones where delay would be dangerous and detrimental. In other words, where we have spent $147,000,000 to promote a 9-foot channel from St. Louis to Minneapolis, and need $22,000,000 more to complete the job, you waste the $147,000,000, make it useless, practically throw the money into the river for the need of this additional appropriation this year, stopping short of the goal. Why not go on and complete this magnificient job up there which would give us justice and equity with the rest of the Nation and the world?

Do you know how population figures look up there in the Northwest since the Panama Canal was completed in 1907, and since the Interstate Commerce Commission took hold of this Nation and its freight structure? I shall read to you a few of the figures which I put into the committee hearings when testifying in connection with this bill, showing just how this situation has affected us up there. In the period from 1880 to 1890 our population increased 67.8 percent, but since then we have been going down rapidly and during the recent period from 1920 to 1930, up to the last census, our general average increase in population for the State was only 7.4 percent, but then during the following 7 years as reported by census figures, Minnesota, the flowering, fertile spot of the Nation increased only one-half as much as the entire Nation's general average, and South Dakota, the State of the gentleman who last addressed the Committee, went down from 698,849 to 692,000, according to the census figures, and Nebraska went down 14,000—all that area up there drying up, going to the dogs simply because we waste our time here and let some other organization do the job that we are sent here to do, which is to look after the welfare of our Nation in general, and our States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has again expired.

Mr. POWERS. I yield the gentleman 2 minutes more.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Now let us get down to cases. We ship into Minneapolis approximately 1,000,000 tons of coal a year. Of the barge-line facilities, the dock we have there now, because of the fact it lies in a deep, rocky chasm, so that there is no chance to build additional facilities and that is therefore where the barge line now ends. In this rocky chasm there could be handled last year only 96,000 tons as a maximum out of a million moved in for Minneapolis, and we were able to ship up there and lay down on that dock only 96,000 tons, a mere drop in the bucket. This is to say nothing of the 16,000,000 total coal tonnage used in our Northwest area.

It is estimated that if we could utilize the barge line by getting up above the falls of St. Anthony, where we need to spend this $3,845,000 which we request and which the Army engineers recommend, we could save $2,000,000 a year in the economy of the citizens of Minneapolis alone on that one item of coal, to say nothing as to the savings to the entire Northwest area, on this and all of the other items which can be shipped in and out of there, such as dairy products and fertilizer from the Tennessee Valley. We would use a lot more of it if you would give us decent transportation facilities and freight rates up there and a chance to use the barge line—cement, sand and gravel, petroleum from Oklahoma and Texas and other States, sugar, salt, farm and other machinery, iron and steel products, lumber, all kinds of grain, of course, cereal products, and scrap iron.

The amount of tonnage that we could ship into that district is unlimited, if we could get justice up there—if we could get this barge line into the city so that we could use it along the shore line that we have available in the upper harbor, where we have 6 miles of level land lying along the two banks of the Mississippi River.

In conclusion, I want to say that I am not blaming anybody in particular for this thing. I think we have just gone to sleep on the job here and do not realize the great need of that beautiful district up there for the aid which I have pointed out to its trade and industry and all branches of commerce, having to do with the cost of living, the farmers' prices, and our unemployment scourge with all of its dangers and liabilities. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. HINSHAW].

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand a copy of the Washington Daily News for this afternoon which carries the screaming headline, "Hundreds homeless in California floods."

It so happens that that particular flood occurred in the northern part of my great State, but it might just as easily have been in the southern part, in which I live.

We have a grand and glorious State, full of sunshine, orange blossoms, beautiful girls, and the blue Pacific Ocean on its western border, but we do occasionally get rain.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. And why not speak of the splendid men from California?

Mr. HINSHAW. I thank you very much. The gentlewoman is most kind?

Mr. HOFFMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HINSHAW. I yield.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Are any of these girls on the Labor Board as review attorneys?

Mr. HINSHAW. I understand there is one in northern California who is on the Board.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Has she any other qualifications?

Mr. HINSHAW. Not that I know of. [Laughter.]

In my own particular section, the southern section, the average rainfall per year is something in the neighborhood of 18 inches. At least 17 inches of that occurs, as a rule, in the three winter months. The rest of the year you can go to sleep outdoors all night and not worry about a drop of rain on your head, but in the wintertime I have seen it rain as much as 12 inches in 24 hours. As I say, we are in the land of sunshine and all that; but when it rains, brother, it really rains. [Laughter.]

We are very grateful to the Congress of the United States, the Corps of Engineers, and other agencies of the Federal Government for the splendid work they have done to date in helping us to control the floodwaters that come down behind us from the mountains that lie above our principal cities. In the past and to date a considerable amount of money has been expended on flood-control work. I know, however, in the proposed detail for expenditure in the fiscal year 1941 in Los Angeles County it provides $600,000 for reimbursement to local interests; $1,274,000 for the completion of the Hansen Dam, which is a retarding basin; $3,335,000 for the Sepulveda Dam; $6,258,700 for the Los Angeles River channel. In addition to that, there are $150,000 for the detail plans and surveys. The actual work proposed to be done in Los Angeles County in the fiscal year 1941 amounts to $11,467,000. The amount then required to complete this work after the fiscal year 1941 is $12,990,800. Of this amount, $1,110,000 remains to be expended on the Sepulveda Dam after 1941.

In the hearing, on page 146, under table 12, which states the amount that can be profitably expended during the fiscal year 1941 for flood control generally, as reported in the Annual Report of the Chief of Engineers for the Fiscal Year 1939, it shows that the amount that could profitably be expended in the Los Angeles County drainage area in the fiscal year 1941 amounts to $21,454,100. If the two amounts that I have previously given, the proposed amount for the fiscal year 1941 and the amount required to complete after 1941, are added together, I believe you will find that the figures approximately add up to the total that could be done profitably in 1941 if the money were made available. In other words, the total amount of work that we are contemplating there could be completed in the fiscal year 1941.

In our section of the country, and because of our experiences, we very much appreciate the flood hazards that are likely to descend upon the rest of the United States. We are therefore most sympathetic toward flood-control works wherever they occur. We would like very much to have the work in our section of the country completed in the next fiscal year, as it could easily be done. However, there are certain of these works which actually should be completed, not only for the safety of our residents but for the safety of the work that has already been completed.

I am speaking particularly of the $1,110,000 remaining to be expended after 1941 on the Sepulveda Dam. If this amount could be expended in the fiscal year 1941, and complete the work on that dam, not only would it safeguard the lives and property of people living below the dam, but millions and millions of dollars' worth of work heretofore done on the Los Angeles River channel could also be safeguarded from destruction in the event of flood.

I hope that when the bill is read for amendment the total amount in the bill, $70,000,000 for flood control for the fiscal year 1941, will be increased. If such an amendment is made I shall support it wholeheartedly.

As you will remember, last year when this appropriation bill was before the House the President of the United States wrote a letter saying that if the bill were passed as it had been sent to the House he would set aside an additional $50,000,000 from the W. P. A. funds to be used on flood-control work. It was most undesirable that that fund should be appropriated from the W. P. A. because when W. P. A. money is used on flood-control work there is necessarily a paragraph included in such contracts requiring that all except the most skilled labor shall be taken from relief rolls.

I note on page 133 of the hearings that the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. CASE] inquired of General Schley concerning this matter. I read from the hearings:

Mr. CASE. During the past year did you have some relief funds available?

General SCHLEY. No, sir.

Mr. CASE. You did have some experience within the past 2 or 3 years in using some relief money?

General SCHLEY. Yes; we had.

Mr. CASE. What was your experience with that? Is that a satisfactory way of working on these projects?

General SCHLEY. It is not a satisfactory way of doing the class of work we have to do. There is a very small part of our work that is suitable for relief labor. The principal reason is that the plant has been developed so that the work on these projects would be unreasonably expensive if done by hand labor. For that reason we have a much greater cost for plant and materials than can be used under the regulations governing the use of relief money; and also there are not on relief the high-type skilled men needed to operate those machines.

Mr. CASE. You feel, on the basis of your experience, that if you were to have any given amount of money that would be better expended through the regular operations of the Army engineers than to have that amount earmarked in a relief bill?

General SCHLEY. Very much better. We have much of our work under contract, and it is difficult to get the contractor to work under those rules.

A few minutes ago I asked the chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee in charge of this bill whether or not it was proposed that relief funds would be applied to flood-control works, and he answered that to the best of his knowledge he had no such intimation.

Mr. Chairman, I hope an additional amount will be appropriated for flood control, but I would oppose that money coming from relief funds for the reasons stated. I want to make sure that there is no such transfer, and I will join with others, as I did last year, in increasing the direct appropriation for flood control in order to obviate that possibility. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this time in order to speak of a flood-control project far from the city of Denver, which I have the honor to represent. It is, however, a project of great importance to the State of Colorado and also to the State of Kansas. Furthermore, it is the project in which my deceased colleague took the greatest interest. When completed, it will be an imposing tangible monument to him and to the intelligent persistence with which continuously throughout 6½ years he urged and worked for its approval and construction. Work on it has already commenced and, I trust, will be carried on as rapidly as practicable to prompt completion. I refer to the Caddoa Dam and Reservoir project on the Arkansas River in southeastern Colorado.

Doubtless you all know of the interest in this project by the Honorable John A. Martin, Representative of the Third District of Colorado, whose sudden and untimely death on December 23, 1939, has saddened all of us. Throughout his term of service, from 1933 to 1939, he made as his principal objectives securing a favorable report by the Engineer Corps of the Army, approval and authorization by the Congress, and the beginning of actual construction of Caddoa Dam and Reservoir. Work on this project has been commenced and is now well under way. If John Martin were still living, it would be entirely unnecessary for anyone else to speak on this subject, because he would be here emphasizing to you with his characteristic vigor how much the carrying on and completion of this project means to southeastern Colorado and also to southwestern Kansas.

The able Representative of the Seventh Congressional District of Kansas, the Honorable CLIFFORD R. HOPE, I understand appeared before the subcommittee of the Appropriations Committee also stressing the importance of continuing and completing this project, not only to the citizens of John Martin's district in Colorado but also to Mr. HOPE's district in southwestern Kansas. Indeed, Caddoa Dam is not only of vital importance to two great congressional districts; it is also of State-wide moment to both Kansas and Colorado—the two most populous Commonwealths between the Missouri River and the Pacific coast. For 50 years continuously the sovereign States of Colorado and Kansas and their respective citizens have been litigating in many courts over their respective rights to the water of the Arkansas River. The completion of Caddoa Dam will compose these controversies.

The total Budget estimate for flood-control projects for the fiscal year July 1, 1940, to June 30, 1941, is $70,000,000. For the present fiscal year, ending June 30, 1940, the appropriations for flood control aggregate $133,000,000. The proposed reduction of $63,000,000 would mean that the Engineer Corps of the Army would be unable to undertake construction on any projects which have already been authorized by the Congress but on which work has not yet begun. If the Congress appropriates for the next fiscal year no more than the $70,000,000 estimated by the Budget, construction could be prosecuted only on those projects on which work has already been commenced, and such construction would necessarily be on a considerably reduced scale.

If you adopt no more than the Budget estimate, I am not informed as to what portion of this $70,000,000 would be devoted to work on Caddoa Dam. However, I am confident that by reason of the high priority accorded to Caddoa Dam a proper proportion will be devoted by the Engineer Corps of the Army to this project. Probably $2,000,000 would be so devoted to construction on this project, as set forth on page 5 of the report of the Committee on Appropriations on the pending bill.

However, I do wish to emphasize that any further reduction in appropriations below $70,000,000 for the fiscal year July 1, 1940–June 30, 1941, would be disastrous to the entire flood-control program. Any further reduction below $70,000,000 would render it impracticable for the Army engineers to carry on their work with efficiency. Furthermore, work on some of the projects now under construction would necessarily be suspended.

I am sure all of you share my regret that the gentleman from Colorado, JOHN A. MARTIN, is not here to emphasize to you the value of Caddoa Dam. But I trust that this statement of mine will suffice to remind you of its importance to almost half a million people and to the sovereign States of Kansas and Colorado.

The following statement, dated January 1, 1940, was prepared by Capt. James H. Stratton, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, the district engineer under whose direct charge work on the Caddoa Dam and Reservoir project is being executed:

INFORMATION CONCERNING THE CADDOA DAM AND RESERVOIR PROJECT

1. Location: Caddoa Dam will be located on the Arkansas River in Bent County, Colo., about 1.4 miles downstream from the village of Caddoa and about 58 miles upstream from the Colorado-Kansas State line. The dam site may be reached by automobile from Lamar or Las Animas, Colo., via United States Highway No. 50 to Hasty, Colo., thence south by a county highway 4 miles to the dam site.

2. Authorization and purpose: The construction of the Caddoa Reservoir project by the Corps of Engineers, United States Army, was authorized by Congress in the Flood Control Act of June 22, 1936, to provide for flood control and water conservation in Colorado and Kansas. Under the provisions of the Flood Control Act of 1938, operation and maintenance of the completed project will also be under the supervision of the Corps of Engineers.

3. Benefits: The Caddoa Reservoir will control all floods of record within bankful capacity downstream from the dam. In addition it will conserve the flow of the river for its regulated and beneficial use on irrigated areas, which at the present time depend on the erratic flow of the stream for their water supply. The upper portion of the reservoir will be used for flood control, permitting the reduction of all floods of record to about 10,000 cubic feet per second, or less, at the site. The lower portion of the reservoir will be allocated to conservation storage and will regulate all the run-off of the Arkansas River except during years of unusually large floods.

4. Watershed: a. General: The watershed of the Arkansas River above the Caddoa Dam site is about 206 miles in length, with an average width of about 92 miles, and includes approximately 18,910 square miles of drainage area, of which 5,800 square miles is rugged, mountainous country. The principal tributaries to the Arkansas River above the dam site are:

Watershed area

Fountain River	square miles	940
Chico Creek	do	800
Huerfano River	do	1,850
Apishapa River	do	1,140
Horse Creek	do	1,450
Purgatoire River	do	3,390

Elevations range from over 12,000 feet in the headwaters to about 3,800 feet in the vicinity of the dam site, and slopes vary from a maximum of about 110 feet per mile in the upper reaches to about 7.2 feet per mile in the reach including the reservoir basin. These slopes result in flood flows characterized by rapid rise, high peak discharge, and short duration.

b. Precipitation: The mean annual precipitation on the watershed above the dam site varies between approximately 12 inches at Caddoa to 25 or more inches in the mountainous upper reaches, with an average of approximately 16 inches. Much of the precipitation in the mountainous region occurs as snow. The greatest recorded storm was that of June 2 to 6, 1921, which centered over the basin between Canyon City and Pueblo, Colo.

c. Stream flow: The flood caused by the storm of June 1921 resulted in an estimated peak discharge of 170,000 cubic feet per second at Caddoa and a total estimated run-off of 555,400 acre-feet. Legendary and historical accounts of floods on the Arkansas go back to the year 1844, in which one of the greatest floods of history occurred in the lower reaches. Available data indicate that in this year a great flood also occurred in the upper reaches, but information is insufficient to support a reasonable estimate of the peak flow. The mean annual discharge of the Arkansas River at Caddoa over a 23-year period between 1914 to 1937 is estimated at 315,000 acre-feet, with a maximum of 1,073,000 acre-feet in 1921 and a minimum of 89,000 acre-feet in 1934.

5. Description of dam: The dam will be a concrete and earth fill structure with a spillway located in the concrete section of the dam. The dam in the flood plain, including the spillway section, will have a length of about 4,000 feet and its crest will be at elevation 3880, or about 120 feet above the elevation of the present valley floor. The spillway section, with crest at elevation 3840, will be mass concrete founded on rock at the approximate elevation 3730. Control gates for flood control and low-water regulation will be provided in the spillway section. Low dikes on top of both abutments connecting to high ground will increase the over-all length of the structure to a total of about 3 miles.

6. Reservoir: The reservoir at maximum pool, elevation 3,870, will be approximately 14.2 miles in length with an average width of about 1.9 miles. At this level it will cover an area of 27½ square miles. The conservation pool, elevation 3,851, will be approximately 11.8 miles long and will have an average width of 1.5 miles. The area inundated will consist of the river valley and rolling grazing lands to the north and sand hills to the south. Consideration of both adequate flood-control storage and protection without endangering the Veterans' Administration Hospital at Fort Lyon led to the adoption of a maximum pool elevation of 3,870, with total reservoir capacity of 655,000 acre-feet. A capacity of 385,000 acre-feet below elevation 3,851 will be allocated to conservation storage and 270,000 acre-feet from elevation 3,851 to elevation 3,870 will be reserved for flood control.

7. Relocations: a. Railroad: The main line of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway between Las Animas and Lamar, Colo., lies within the reservoir area and about 20 miles of line will be relocated. This relocation will involve about 3,920,000 cubic yards of grading, the construction of steel bridges over Rule, Caddoa, and Mud Creeks, and other appurtenant works. In portions of the area to be traversed by the relocated line there are shifting sand dunes of considerable magnitude. Stabilization of these dunes is being undertaken by the Corps of Engineers in consultation with the Soil Conservation Service.

b. Highway and utilities: 3.1 miles of county road in the vicinity of the village of Caddoa will be relocated. Several telephone and telegraph lines which are located within the reservoir area will also be relocated.

c. Municipal: The village of Caddoa, having a population of approximately 100, is located in the reservoir area, about 1.4 miles above the dam, and will have to be abandoned. Fort Lyon, a United States reservation and Veterans' Administration facility, representing an approximate investment of $3,000,000, is located near the head of the reservoir. As a considerable part of this property would be subject to inundation if the maximum flood pool is reached unless protective works are provided, an earth levee approximately 2.3 miles long will be constructed around the reservation.

8. Construction program: From the War Department Civil Appropriation Acts of 1938 and 1939, $3,883,100 has been allotted to the Caddoa Reservoir project, which will provide for completion of investigations, design, acquisition of land, and the relocation of the railroad. Bids for construction of the roadbed and masonry for the relocation of the railroad were opened at Las Animas, Colo., on November 13, 1939, the Western Contracting Corporation, Sioux City, Iowa, being the low bidder in the amount of $1,058,668.40. A contract for the work was awarded on November 15, 1939, and work has commenced. It is contemplated that a contract for furnishing and erecting the steel for the bridges in connection with this relocation will be advertised in January 1940. The railway company will perform the work of laying and ballasting track and constructing the signal system. Design of the dam itself will be completed during the winter of 1939–40, and it is expected that a construction contract for the entire dam structure will be advertised in the late spring of 1940, subject to the availability of funds. Completion of construction of the project is scheduled for the summer of 1943.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. CARTWRIGHT] such time as he may desire.

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this time because I am interested in the bill but feel that certain changes should be made before final action is taken upon it.

I am very much interested in the construction of the Wister Reservoir on the Poteau River in Le Flore County, Okla. This is one of the projects in the Flood Control Act approved June 28, 1938, which authorized $21,000,000 for reservoirs in the Arkansas River Basin. I feel that it should have been given priority in the recommendations of the engineers, but the excuse was given that the investigations had not been completed, and other reservoirs in a more advanced state of completion were selected. An allotment of funds totaling $92,500 have been made to finish these field investigations and studies, and I am now informed that the detailed report on the development of this project is scheduled to be received in the Office of the Chief of Engineers about March 1, 1940.

In 1938 I had the honor to introduce President Roosevelt at Wister, and he spent about 5 minutes describing the benefits that would be derived from the construction of the Wister Dam. Last year a delegation of citizens from Le Flore County came to Washington and we had a hearing before War Department officials. We were led to believe that the Wister project would be recommended for construction this year.

Now the engineers say it will need additional authority; therefore, I have introduced a bill [H. R. 8421] to amend the authorization for the Arkansas River Basin to provide authority for an additional appropriation in such amount as may be necessary to construct the Wister Reservoir. This bill is now before the Flood Control Committee and I understand hearings will be held soon.

This dam is greatly needed. Thousands of dollars worth of damage is incurred each year through floodwaters of the Poteau River. I, together with citizens of this territory, have been advocating this project for many years; the engineers have approved it and we feel we have waited long enough for funds for its construction. I believe that flood control is an essential part of our national defense and I am in favor of increasing the appropriation in this bill in a sufficient amount so that this and other meritorious projects may not be delayed any longer.

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as she may desire to the gentlewoman from Massachusetts [Mrs. ROGERS].

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I want to thank the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SNYDER], also the majority and minority members of the committee and the head of the minority members, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. POWERS], for the interest they have taken in flood-control work. I know I have bothered them a great deal in the past in my interest in flood-control work on the Merrimack River, and I want them to know that I deeply appreciate all they have done in this bill. I wish they might have seen their way clear to have gone further, but I am very grateful for what they have already done. I hope that if a survey which is now being made of the Merrimack River and which contains further recommendations for flood control comes into the Congress in time for approval by the Senate that the House will agree to the inclusion in this bill of sufficient money to carry it out. The Merrimack River is an extremely important river. It runs through a closely populated valley. There are more industries in that valley than in any valley in the world. I want to tell the House again how important it is to protect life and property along that river and to bespeak your help.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ELLIS].

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the statement made by the gentleman from New Jersey to the effect it is the old Army game to come in here and ask for a lot more than they expect to get, may I say that surely no one would accuse the Army engineers of not being most conservative in all of their estimates and in all of their statements.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIS. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. POWERS. I referred to the Army and the Navy. I still refer to the Army and Navy and not particularly to the Army engineers.

Mr. ELLIS. I thank the gentleman. In answer to the gentlemen who criticize the committee for letting the Budget do all of its thinking for it, may I say I am glad that in this instance the committee did not reduce that figure below the amount recommended. The committee did save, I believe, $111,000,000 in the Navy bill. I am one of those who is disappointed because they did not use some of that which they had saved in this instance. I was one of those who went before the committee and asked for an additional $50,000,000.

Last year the Army engineers said they could profitably expend for the fiscal year 1940, $195,000,000. We gave them finally $133,000,000, or 68 percent of what they said they could profitably expend.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIS. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. POWERS. Is that not exactly like a man owning a $4,000 house and saying that he could profitably expend $500 for repairs if he had the money?

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, indeed; but I should like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that we have projects authorized by authorization bills in 1936, 1937, and 1938 in the total sum of $1,148,000,000, and that we have expenditures or appropriations authorized not in that amount but in the amount of $698,000,000 only, and all the time the Army engineers are basing their estimates not on the total amount of projects authorized but on the total appropriations authorized; therefore, they are ultraconservative.

Mr. POWERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIS. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. POWERS. May I again remind the gentleman that if the Appropriations Committee took into consideration every authorization that has been passed we would be appropriating about $20,000,000,000 a year, and the country would be in bankruptcy quickly.

Mr. ELLIS. In answer to what the gentleman states, last year we gave them 68 percent of what the engineers said they could profitably expend. This year they said they could profitably expend $206,600,000. There was received from the Budget an item of $70,000,000, and you approved that this year. That is 33 percent of what the Army engineers said they could profitably expend as compared with the 68 percent we gave them last year.

Mr. POWERS. The amount of money that the gentleman states the Budget recommended was the amount recommended by the President of the United States.

Mr. ELLIS. That is true, but the gentleman knows that we often change those amounts. The gentleman knows that we sometimes raise them and we sometimes lower them.

Mr. POWERS. That is the reason for the $45,000,000,000 debt we have today.

Mr. ELLIS. Yes, but if you are going to go by the President's figure we have saved $111,000,000 in one bill.

Mr. POWERS. We cannot save if we are going to reappropriate the money for something else. We are trying to save money.

Mr. ELLIS. Then, I will not use the word "save." We have come down from the figure which the President suggested to the Budget—$111,000,000 in one bill alone. Now, I want to get this percentage over to you. If we should add $50,000,000 to the $70,000,000 which is here, that would be only 58 percent of what the Army engineers say the could profitably expend as compared with 68 percent which we gave them last year. We would still be 10 percent, as compared with last year, under what they say they could profitably expend.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I have taken a lot of the gentleman's time and while I have only a few minutes left, I yield the gentleman 2 minutes.

Mr. ELLIS. Mr. Chairman, 71 projects in this Nation will not be begun if this figure stands as it is, and that number does not include 91 projects in which there was manifested no local interest, according to the Army engineers. They did not include those in this figure.

Mr. Chairman, we have for a long time measured land in this country the wrong way. We have been measuring it in acres when we should be measuring it in inches deep. Flood control and soil conservation are all tied into one great program in this country. We have already lost 282,000,000 acres, so the Soil Conservation Service tells use, in land that has been utterly destroyed in this country by erosion, which is equal to eight States the size of my State of Arkansas. Every year there is poured into the ocean around these United States enough soil, so the Soil Conservation Service tells us, to fill a sufficient number of freight cars to wind around this old earth 18 times at the equator.

I certainly hope that before this bill goes to the President amendments will be offered to increase the appropriation by $50,000,000, and I hope the gentlemen of the committee will not oppose those amendments.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOFFMAN].

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Chairman, this is just to call attention to editorials in the local papers published here in Washington concerning the precedents that were cited by Attorney General Jackson as to why he should not tell the Smith committee whether Mr. Madden and his friends on the Labor Board had violated the statute. The thought that came to me was that undoubtedly under those precedents Mr. Jackson is right. He had no duty to advise us. He is the adviser of the President.

Then I wondered, Mr. Jackson having taken the oath of office—I suppose he took it; it has been customary prior to this administration—to enforce the laws, if, having had these facts presented to him—and it is not a case where Jones says it is so and White says it is not so, it is the testimony sent over by the Smith committee that Mr. Madden himself gave as to what he and his subordinates did in the way of lobbying and how they spent Government money—the facts being admitted and Mr. Jackson not even having, as Murphy did when he was Attorney General, to look up the law to find out how much power the President had or did not have—Mr. Jackson having the statute right there before him and having the facts before him, whether, if he could not advise Congress, he could not take time off from whatever he might be doing to decide whether or not Madden and his associates had violated the law and some action be taken. We must assume that Jackson, being an efficient and conscientious Attorney General, would prosecute if an offense had been committed. Then we must draw the conclusion, inevitably that if he does not do anything, being so anxious to perform his duty, and having the statutes and facts all before him—all sent over by the Smith committee, that in his opinion no offense was committed. So, after all, by his conduct, no matter what he said, he has advised us, has he not? And that is why I am speaking, to call it to his attention that despite the fact that he said he could not advise us, despite the fact of all those precedents, he has practically told us that no offense was committed.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOFFMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EBERHARTER. Perhaps the Attorney General has other matters to consider which are of far greater importance to the people of the country than this little matter to which the gentleman is calling attention, and those cases should be taken care of first.

Mr. HOFFMAN. Perhaps the gentleman is right. I suppose from his viewpoint, this question of the spending of Federal money by Federal officials to influence legislation in violation of a statute may not be of much importance. If that is the gentleman's view, it is all right with me. I am not attempting to advise the Attorney General. I am just calling attention to the fact that, despite his statement that he could not advise us, he has by the fact that he has not taken action, as he would if an offense had been committed, he being one charged with the duty of prosecuting offenders, has, in fact, told us that no offense was committed, which must be good news to Mr. Madden.

Mr. EBERHARTER. I may say for the record that those are not my views.

Mr. HOFFMAN. That is fine. I wish the gentleman would speak to Mr. Jackson.

The editorial and the news item to which I referred are as follows:

[From the Washington (D. C.) Evening Star of February 26, 1940]

JACKSON DECLINES TO TELL SMITH IF NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD BROKE LOBBYING LAW

Attorney General Jackson declined today to tell House investigators whether the National Labor Relations Board had violated a law which forbids the use of Federal appropriations for lobbying.

He wrote Chairman SMITH, of the committee investigating the Board, that the Justice Department makes legal rulings only at the request of the President or the head of an executive department.

The committee recently received evidence tending to show Chairman J. Warren Madden, of the Board, and some of his assistants actively sought to rally witnesses in opposition to Wagner Act amendments. Representative SMITH then asked Mr. Jackson for a ruling on the possibility that the Board was violating the law by following that procedure.

Mr. Jackson's letter said, in part:

"Almost from the beginning of the Government, my predecessors have, with great unanimity, taken the position that the statutes prescribing the duties of the Attorney General do not authorize him to render opinions to the Congress or to its committees or Members.

"These statutes have not been substantially changed since 1789. As early as 1818, Attorney General Wirt, and as late as October 4, 1939, Attorney General Murphy each ruled that under the statutes Attorneys General are not authorized to give official opinions on questions of law except upon call of the President or the head of an executive department to enable him to decide a question pending in his own department for action.

"It has been pointed out that the effort to advise both the executive and the legislative branches of the Government would be inappropriate under our doctrine of separation of the powers of the two branches, and that, like other efforts to serve two masters, such a practice would likely introduce conflict of duties. Congress has never seen fit to change the statutes so construed, and I take it that in spite of frequent requests for opinions Congress, in its deliberate judgment, has acquiesced in the meaning so uniformly ascribed to these statutes for well over a century."

SPEAKING OF PRECEDENTS

Attorney General Jackson refuses to advise a committee of Congress whether he thinks Labor Board officials violated the law when they drummed up labor-union pressure against proposed economies in the Board's appropriations.

Mr. Jackson cites a long line of precedents to prove that the Attorney General is the chief counsel for the executive department only. In other words, if the legislative department wants legal advice it will have to go elsewhere.

So be it. We wouldn't care to argue precedents with so eminent a practitioner.

Anyway we are more interested in another line of precedents and in what the Attorney General is going to do about observing it. We refer to the long-established custom of public prosecutors taking questions of alleged violations of the law before grand juries and courts.

The evidence has been handed to Mr. Jackson on a silver platter—evidence that Labor Board officials, by long-distance telephone and telegraph, at Government expense, organized a campaign of protest to Congress against proposed cuts in Labor Board appropriations. And the chapter and verse of the law have been cited—that forgotten law, honored more in breach than observance, a law stating clearly that no funds voted by Congress shall ever be used directly or indirectly to "influence a Member of Congress to favor or oppose any legislation or appropriation."

If Labor Board officers were the only offenders this apparent violation might be shrugged aside. But the fact is that for years the whole Federal bureaucracy has been feeding its increasing appetite by just such high-pressure lobbying as referred to here.

So, we ask, is Mr. Jackson going to enforce the law or isn't he?

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. VOORHIS].

Mr. VOORHIS of California. Mr. Chairman, this appropriation for flood-control work means everything in the world to the section of the country from which I come. We have a little section of the country about 50 miles wide and 30 miles deep in which 3,000,000 people live, a section where we have not only a great city and large industries but also a lot of little farms and little homes, a great number of which are exposed constantly to danger from what we call flash floods. A flash flood is one that can come in a matter of 3 or 4 hours if the rains are heavy in the mountains which lie immediately back of this very heavily populated area.

The only protection we can have against such floods and the only means we can have for controlling those life-giving waters so that they may be a means of help to humanity instead of a means of destruction is this flood-control program and water-conservation measures. I appeal to you to consider this thought, that if the figure contained in the bill of $70,000,000 is adhered to, if it is not increased, it may mean that little work will be done—I hope this is not true, but I fear it is—on the San Gabriel River, a stream which crosses all the transcontinental railroads going into Los Angeles city, a stream whose flooding in 1938 cut off the city of Los Angeles and that whole area from all the rest of the Nation for a period of about 30 hours, and a stream whose waters have destroyed many a home and farm and caused very great damage to the people of our section.

In addition, we have a situation there where, unless this program is vigorously pushed, even the money heretofore expended may be lost, for our floodwaters are not just waters, they are waters which contain gigantic amounts of debris and boulders, so that our dams fill up and the flood works already constructed in the channels are destroyed unless the program can be pushed forward as rapidly as possible to completion.

I come before the House not as one who is merely begging for Federal assistance but for the reason that the county of Los Angeles has spent $70,000,000 itself on its own flood-control program and will continue to spend every penny it can for the protection of its people. I hope, however, that it is clear from the speeches that have been made here this afternoon how very important and how very vital this matter is to us. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SECREST].

Mr. SECREST. Mr. Chairman, as you know, the Congress in the Flood Control Acts of 1936 and 1938 authorized projects totaling $700,000,000. These projects were to be completed over a period of 5 years. Last year the Army engineers received $133,000,000 for flood control. The Budget recommended for next year only $70,000,000, making it impossible to start many worth-while projects and making it necessary to reduce appropriations for meritorious projects now under construction.

I am convinced that flood control is a most essential part of national defense and feel that $50,000,000 of the funds proposed for national defense should be transferred to the appropriation for flood control. This represents the price of one large battleship, which would require about 5 years to build.

At three places in the world major wars are being conducted and new machinery of destruction is being devised constantly. For this reason we should not spend an unreasonable amount for military equipment which might be made obsolete in the course of a few months. One flood such as we experienced in the Ohio Valley in 1937 could paralyze industry and transportation for 2 or 3 months. If this happens during the crisis of a great war, no one could predict what disastrous consequences might follow.

Economy is essential, and it is for this reason that I suggest a transfer of funds rather than an increase in the Budget. By this action on the part of the Congress flood control would be promoted, national defense would be more secure, and the same degree of economy would be achieved. I am vitally interested in the flood-control problem of the Nation, in the protection of human life and property from flood, and especially am I interested in securing reasonable funds to carry out the program of the Federal Government in acquiring assets of the Muskingum conservancy district, thereby permitting the full use of the 14 reservoirs that have been constructed for flood control in the Muskingum Valley.

It is my hope that sufficient money can be made available in the next 3 years to wholly carry out the terms of the last Flood Control Act, as they apply to the Muskingum Valley. For this reason I am urging the largest possible amount for flood control that can be reasonably appropriated within the total Budget recommendations.

The economy and common sense of flood control can be illustrated by a consideration of flood losses in the Ohio Valley alone.

In 1913, 425 people drowned and $180,000,000 worth of property was destroyed.

In 1933, 10 people were drowned and $100,000,000 worth of property was lost.

In the flood of 1936, 187 people drowned and $250,000,000 worth of property was lost.

In 1937, 500 people drowned and the property loss was estimated at $500,000,000.

In fact, in the past 65 years more than 50 floods have occurred in the various parts of the Ohio Valley resulting in a loss of more than 1,000 lives, with a conservative property loss well in excess of $1,000,000,000. Since 1933, more property has been lost in the Ohio Valley alone than would be required to complete every flood-control project thus far authorized by Congress for the entire Nation. This is one program where we can move forth and be certain of saving far more than we expend for flood control. Nothing is more economical than to increase the flood-control appropriation by reducing other items in the Budget which are far less necessary.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SECREST. I yield.

Mr. RANKIN. Have not those low dams that were built in the Ohio River by the Hoover administration a few years ago contributed largely to that condition?

Mr. SECREST. In my opinion, dams for river improvement to raise the water level for navigation retard a certain amount of water and, of course, when you have a big flood those dams are low.

Mr. RANKIN. If they had been high dams, such as the dams on the Tennessee River, this trouble could be averted, and they would have produced enough power to pay for themselves in a few years.

Mr. SECREST. We are building those large reservoirs now. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LUDLOW].

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Chairman, I rise today to propose a plank for the next Democratic national platform. To show how impartial and cosmopolitan I try to be, I propose the same plank for the Republican national platform——

Mr. RANKIN. Just let them try it first. [Laughter.]

Mr. LUDLOW. Wait until you hear the plank. I will say to my beloved friend from Mississippi that the plank I propose is a universal plank, good for all parties, and if there be those who are looking for platform material for the minor parties I recommend it to them, too. [Laughter.]

The plank which I propose for the Democratic national platform, the Republican national platform, and all other national political platforms, in 1940, is as follows:

Resolved, That we favor a Nation-wide referendum before declaration of war, except in case of invasion or internal rebellion.

The plank I suggest would fit well into the platform of all political parties because it is American, and not partisan. Since its purpose is the extension of the frontiers of democracy in a world where totalitarianism is rampant and aggressive it would be particularly appropriate to give it a place in the 1940 platform of the Democratic Party of America—the party that was founded by Thomas Jefferson and dedicated to the defense and perpetuation of human rights. The plank I propose would round out and complete Jefferson's cherished Bill of Rights and make it more definitely applicable to twentieth-century conditions.

APPEAL TO YOUTH

My appeal today is to the youth of our land, the makers of the America of tomorrow. I wish I had the ability to deliver a speech that would be a ringing challenge to our young people, a speech that would stir them to a sense of their responsibilities as they have never been stirred before; a speech that would arouse to intense activity their patriotic consciousness, their alertness, and their constructive genius. I say this because I frankly believe that we elders have made a mess of it in charting the future destiny of America and that it is time for our young people to take over and establish a new order of economic stability and peace on the foundations of democracy. As I approach the shades of evening I can think of no task in the limitless field of service that would be more soul satisfying to me than to be one of the leaders in starting what might appropriately be named a youth movement for democracy in America.

Such a movement is long overdue, and now is the ideal time to launch it and start it on its way. We are beginning a new epoch in history—the epoch of the 1940's. On the threshold of this epoch we should let the dead past bury its dead and turn our faces to the future. Is it not an inspiring thought that we should pause at the beginning of this new epoch, take stock of our precarious position in a world of strife and the depths of human suffering in our own land and do some real planning, to the end that by the time this decade is ended America may be on a solid and permanent foundation of peace with all nations and economic sufficiency at home? And who could most appropriately assume that gigantic task of master building—the statesmen who have run their course and who have not been able to bring America out of its muddled condition, or the young men and women who are now coming into the heritage of the fathers and on whom the full responsibility of government will soon rest? It seems to me there is but one answer to this question.

TWO ORGANIZATIONS THAT MIGHT PROPERLY LEAD

I plead with such organizations as the Junior Chamber of Commerce of America and the Young Democrats of America that now is the time to assert themselves and to assume the task of cooperation in the building of a better economic future for our country, a future in which hunger and nakedness will disappear from our midst and our peace with all nations will be established on a basis of permanent stability. If I could, I would like to say something today that would thrill these two great organizations with a realization of the opportunity for service in nation building that now lies before them. I refer to these large groups by name because I know the philosophy that inspires and actuates both of them. It is a true American philosophy. Both are opposed to participation in foreign quarrels that are none of our business. If America were attacked by some foreign foe, they would rise to the last man to the defense of our homes and firesides, but the internationalist meddlers could never get them to agree that all of Europe is worth the blood of one American boy. These groups both believe in keeping out of foreign entanglements and in making America a worth-while place for future generations, where our children and our children's children can live free from worry, in the full enjoyment of their God-given right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

The Junior Chamber of Commerce is composed of members of both political parties, between the ages of 21 and 35, and the Young Democrats of America is a democratic organization, but both believe that the paramount duty is to keep out of the miasmas of hates, boundary disputes, blood feuds, and the like that are sinking so many foreign nations to the depths of perdition. There are many other organizations of young people, church and secular, practically all of the members of which are of military age, all willing and anxious to do their duty as God gives them the light to see their duty but who abhor the thought of involvement in foreign wars, and to them also I present my plea for support of a youth movement for democracy in America.

PLANK PROPOSED BY YOUNG DEMOCRATS

Now let us consider a little further the plank I propose for the 1940 national political platform:

Resolved, That we favor a Nation-wide referendum before declaration of war, except in case of invasion or internal rebellion.

Do you recognize that plank as something you have heard before? Does it have a strangely familiar ring? It is not my language but it is an exact copy of a resolution adopted by the Young Democrats of America, that splendid organization of 5,000,000 young men and women who are among the coming citizens of our country, at their national convention held in the city of Indianapolis in August 1937. When James Roosevelt, the chairman of the convention, put the question there was not a single negative vote and the resolution was adopted unanimously, with cheers and stirring emotion. It shows the vision of our young people—the future defenders of the Nation—on this subject. While I did not draft the plank I am proposing, it being the voice of the Young Democrats of America, 5,000,000 strong, yet I do endorse it a thousand percent.

It embodies exactly the idea contained in my proposed war-referendum amendment to the Constitution, which would give the people a right to vote on participation in wars overseas. I will quote the text of the resolution, which I have been urging before Congress for many years, and I am sure all will agree that the two proposals are identical in meaning and substance. My resolution—House Joint Resolution 89—is as follows:

SECTION 1. Except in case of invasion by armed forces, actual or immediately threatened by an approaching military expedition, or attack upon the United States or its Territorial possessions, or by any non-American nation against any country in the Western Hemisphere, the people shall have the sole power by a national referendum to declare war or to engage in warfare overseas. Congress, when it deems a national crisis to exist in conformance with this article, shall by concurrent resolution refer the question to the people.

SEC. 2. Congress shall by law provide for the enforcement of this section.

SEC. 3. The article shall become operative when ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by conventions in the several States, as provided in the Constitution.

Platform planks necessarily must be brief and concise and confined to a statement of principle. The resolution I have proposed—House Joint Resolution 89—would be exactly the proper vehicle to write into the Constitution the immortal principle of democracy adopted by the Young Democrats of America at their national convention of 1937 and generally approved since that time by the youth of our country.

It would be a fine thing for the future of America if our young people would get back of this principle with the fervor of crusaders and would create such a sentiment and such a movement that there would be no doubt of its adoption in the platforms of the major political parties. Here is an opportunity for youth to be of real service in charting the way to a better future of America. It is their opportunity to make certain that totalitarianism and absolutism, which are murdering liberty in so many foreign countries and reducing human beings to the level of slaves, shall never make their hateful appearance in America.

ENLARGEMENT OF DEMOCRACY NEEDED

What the youth of America should be most interested in and what they can bring about if they set themselves resolutely to the task, is an enlargement of democracy in America. That is the gateway to the more abundant life, to the equality of opportunity, and the freedom of action that are the hope and dream of youth. That is the approach to peace and to the happiness that can be founded only upon economic justice and stability. Democracy is the antidote for war. We will get rid of war as we build up our democracy. Wars are not made by the people but by rulers. Woodrow Wilson strikingly placed the responsibility for wars when he said that he had heard of governments making war on governments but never within the entire range of his study and observation had he known of peoples making war on peoples, and the same sentiment was expressed by Franklin D. Roosevelt when he said that "War by governments" must give way to "peace by peoples."

If the amendment which I propose is written into the Constitution, giving the people a right to vote on participation in foreign wars, the most far-reaching possible step will be taken to keep America out of war and to save our young men from the slaughter pens of foreign carnage. If the constitutional amendment approved by the Young Democrats of America and translated into legislative terms by my resolution is adopted, democracy—the rule of the people—will really begin to function in America.

A DEMOCRACY IN NAME ONLY

Until this vital principle is written into the Constitution, America will be a democracy partially and in name only. We call ourselves a democracy, but our democracy stops at the water's edge. In its foreign relations our Government is not a democracy at all but a pure autocracy. A little group in Washington, infinitesimal compared with the entire population, decides whether the blood of our sons shall redden the soil of foreign battlefields, and the people have no decision in the matter. The American citizen can vote for constable or dog catcher, or he may express himself at the polls on the establishment of a pesthouse or the location of a sewer, but he is denied by the Constitution as it stands today any right to vote on the question that most intimately affects his home and his loved ones, the tragic question of war or peace. To me it seems awfully unjust that our young men, the flower of our manhood, the Nation's cannon fodder, have no opportunity to express themselves at the polls on proposals to herd them and send them away to fight and die on fields of foreign carnage in the settlement of age-old boundary disputes and feuds the origin of which no man knows and the end of which no man can foresee. This is as cruel a denial of justice as the imagination can conceive.

The adoption of the constitutional amendment championed by the Young Democrats and embodied in my resolution would broaden our democracy by making the people, instead of a little group, the arbiters to decide when our young men shall be sent overseas to be rammed through with bayonets or strangled with poison gas in some foreign conflict. The time will come when the people of America will demand that right and get it, and then our boasted democracy will become a real democracy. Surely if Representative John Smith's constituents have sense enough, information enough, and intelligence enough to vote for him for Congress, they have sense enough, information enough, and intelligence enough to vote on whether or not they want their sons sent abroad to die in foreign wars. To refuse them such a vote is a cruel denial of what rightfully belongs to them in a democracy.

HOW YOUNG PEOPLE CAN HELP

The young people of America can correct this condition if they will take up the cudgels fearlessly and unitedly and will demand that our democracy shall be broadened so that it will apply in the settlement of the great and tragic issues as well as in the minor and inconsequential things of life.

Sooner or later this issue must be met and our young people would do well to think about meeting it now. Just as Lincoln said that this Nation cannot exist half slave and half free, neither can it exist forever as an Anglo-American democracy, as the internationalists would have it, with emphasis on the "Anglo." Sooner or later the oncoming generations will see the light and then there will be ushered in a new conception of America for Americans, undiluted by foreign "isms" and unfettered by foreign entanglements. But this deliverance will not be effected until the people have a broader conception of and a greater yearning for democracy. They must be made to realize how little our people have to do with the conduct of foreign affairs. They must be made to appreciate how highly centralized the war power is now, when 267 Members of Congress, a bare majority in both branches, could vote a declaration of war, and any President, through the enormous power he wields, could force them into doing it at any time he pleases to involve the country in war. They must be made to see how very little the women of America now have to say in regard to a declaration of war, although they bear the cannon fodder that makes war possible.

As Congress is now constituted, only 6 of the 531 Members are women, so you see how pathetically impotent is the opportunity to give expression to whatever may be woman's viewpoint on any particular war proposal. And why should women not have a vote on participation in foreign wars? They go down into the valley of the shadow of death to bring our boys into the world. Why should they not have something to say as to whether their flesh and blood shall be hurled into the hell of a foreign conflict? [Applause.]

A PERFECT MECHANISM TO INSURE PEACE

Finally, before our people will capture the war power and hold it for themselves to exercise there must be a dissipation of the fogs of deceit and misrepresentation that have been purposely created to cloud the issue. The opponents of the proposed referendum have harped on the claim that instead of keeping America out of war it would more probably get us into war, as the people are more likely to be swept off of their feet in a wave of emotionalism than the Congress is. Those who raise this hoary objection either do not know anything about the mechanism that is set up in my resolution or they intentionally misrepresent it. The resolution says that "Congress, when it deems a national crisis to exist in conformance with this article, shall by concurrent resolution refer the question to the people."

In other words, there cannot possibly be any referendum until the question is referred to the people by a concurrent congressional resolution. Congress must act first and must decide that the time has come to give consideration to a declaration of war, and must so express itself in a resolution, before the people can vote on the question. To put it in another way, Congress must be swept off its feet before the people can be swept off their feet. The final decisive vote will be by the people, and that is where it ought to be, because that is where sovereignty abides. Thus the mechanism of my resolution establishes a double check on war. Now the only check is in Congress, which is singularly overlorded and influenced by the individual who happens at any given time to be President. Under the referendum plan another check is added in a vote by the people themselves, which may approve or disapprove the opinion expressed by Congress. This proposed double check on war would be the greatest peace assurance our country could possibly have. I believe that under the operation of this mechanism America would keep out of all foreign wars—and, indeed, out of all wars—unless occasion might arise to wage a righteous war of defense, which is highly improbable.

This very desirable and beneficent result would be accomplished without the least impairment of our national defense. In case America or any other country in the Western Hemisphere is invaded or attacked, the referendum would not apply. Unless this amendment is written into the Constitution there is every reason to fear that the intensifying of the war in Europe will sooner or later drag us into that conflict.

UNION OF YOUTH FORCES URGED

There are problems of the most acute nature at home which demand the attention of our young people. Youth will be serving well if it dismisses Europe from its worries and concentrates its devotion and constructive genius on making America a better place in which to live. While preparedness is necessary in a world of strife, the youths of America will lay the groundwork for the fulfillment of our magnificent national destiny envisioned by the founding fathers if they will mold our thinking, and as far as possible the thinking of the world, away from the mass murder called war in the direction of love and kindness and the Christian virtues. There is the task of the rehabilitation of millions upon millions of underfed and underprivileged Americans who are the tragic victims of the depression, the backwash of the last war. That task must not be neglected. The problem of unemployment, with its attendant misery and suffering, is crying to heaven for solution. It can be solved if our young people will solemnly resolve that America is not going to be dragged into any foreign entanglements and that our national energies shall be given henceforth, forevermore, to building a better America for Americans.

I hope that our young folks—the makers of the America of tomorrow—will unite their combined forces with the movement which has started at the grass roots of America and which proposes to give the people control of our Government in international as well as domestic affairs through the enactment of a referendum on foreign wars. If they will do this, there will be no need to fear that secret treaties and underhand diplomacy will ever drag us into wars in the future.

The youth of America have it within their power to create a new order that will guarantee the peace and economic security of our country in the long years to come. I hope they will get busy on every front; that they will hold meetings and discuss the question and that they will lose no opportunity to call attention to the fact that five Gallup polls have shown a large majority of the people to be for my referendum proposal and to impress upon the political leaders that if they want an issue that will win the general acclaim and support of our people, they will stand foursquare for a plank declaring for a constitutional referendum on participation in foreign wars.

The most striking cartoon I have seen in many a year appeared in the newspapers only a day or so ago. It was a vivid reminder of the immortal truth of Woodrow Wilson's assertion that war is made by governments and not by peoples. In that cartoon European rulers were assembled around a table playing the game of war. Each ruler had a sizable stack of chips in front of him. Churchill said:

I bet you a million boys.

It came Daladier's turn, and he remarked:

I stay.

On the other side of the table was Hitler. He surveyed his hand with a satisfied look and said:

Dot's fine; und I raise you annudder million poys.

If the boys of America have in them the mettle I think they have, they will not be content to be mere pawns in the game of war. They love their country and would willingly die in its defense, if need be, but they are not going to be herded and sent into slaughter pens in far-away Europe or Asia without having something to say about it. It is this feeling, so obviously based in justice and so consistent with the principles of true democracy, that is bringing the youths of America in great numbers to the support of my proposal to give the people, including those who have to fight and die, a right to vote on participation in overseas warfare.

Youths of America! I beseech you to prepare, before it is too late, to protect and defend your priceless heritage of freedom. If we are dragged into another world war there will be no freedom left to defend. [Applause.]

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the ranking minority Member, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. POWERS], and the rest of the committee to sympathize with me in view of an oversight of mine.

Mr. POWERS. I am always sympathetic toward any request of the gentleman.

Mr. SNYDER. In my presentation of this bill, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] got up and interrogated me several times. For some reason or other I did not put his name down here on the list as having 10 minutes coming to him, and I am going to ask unanimous consent that he be allowed to have 8 additional minutes to the 2 minutes I have remaining, because of my oversight.

Mr. POWERS. Reserving the right to object, the gentleman is asking that the gentleman from Virginia receive 8 additional minutes and the gentleman from Pennsylvania is allotting him 2 minutes at the moment, which makes 10 minutes in all.

Mr. SNYDER. Yes.

Mr. BLAND. If the gentleman will permit, I will tell him that I do not expect to use the 10 minutes. I did ask for the 10 minutes and I did not get it; and, in view of the lateness of the hour, I do not think it would be fair to keep the gentlemen here any longer than 2 minutes.

Mr. POWERS. I do not object, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HOFFMAN. I do not object, either. That is one of the reasons I have been sitting here all this time.

The CHAIRMAN. It was the House that fixed the time for debate and the Committee cannot change that. However, if it is agreeable to the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from New Jersey, as well as the gentleman from Virginia, the Clerk can read the first paragraph, and in that manner the gentleman from Virginia can be recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. POWERS. Under the rules of the House, can the gentleman be recognized after the first paragraph has been read?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can move to strike out the last word and be recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. POWERS. Did not the House agree that when the first paragraph was read the Committee would rise?

The CHAIRMAN. A motion to strike out the last word is entirely within the discretion of the Committee itself.

Mr. POWERS. At this late hour, Mr. Chairman, we could go on all night with striking out as many words as there are in the first paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Until a motion to rise was made.

Mr. POWERS. I shall not object to that; but if anyone else attempts to strike out the last word, or anything like that, I must object. It is perfectly all right with me for the gentleman from Virginia to proceed.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums are appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1941, for civil functions administered by the War Department, and for other purposes, namely:

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. Yes.

Mr. POWERS. I understand that it is the purpose of the gentleman from Virginia merely to make a statement?

Mr. BLAND. That is correct. I shall make the major portion of my address tomorrow. The matter to which I shall address myself does not concern me personally any more than it concerns every citizen of the United States. It is the omission of any provision for the Panama Canal under which the work of providing additional facilities may proceed. It concerns every citizen of the Nation just as much as it does me, and while I realize that the problems before the Committee on Appropriations and their efforts to economize are important, yet at the same time I feel that they have made a very great mistake in this particular instance, and that they do not comprehend its importance because of the pressure that is on them in studying other questions that are before them.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. I yield.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, of course, I disagree with the gentleman from Virginia. I am not going to reply to the gentleman this afternoon, but when he makes the major portion of his speech tomorrow or offers an amendment I shall reply.

Mr. BLAND. I think the gentleman is quite apt to reply. I think, Mr. Chairman, if the Committee had read House Document No. 210, Seventy-sixth Congress, the report made on this proposal, and outlining the reasons for it, the Committee would have taken an entirely different view. I call attention now to the testimony of Commander Lowe, of the Navy, before the Legislative Committee when we held hearings on the authorization bill. He said:

Since March 13, the date of the Navy Department letter to this committee, there has been an opportunity to study the plans developed by the Governor of the Panama Canal. Those plans were presented to the committee yesterday. It is believed that those plans are the best that can be produced, all things considered. The additional facilities, including protection, can be provided under those plans at something less than one-third of the cost of the Nicaragua canal. That is a very considerable item. But what is even more important, from the viewpoint of the Navy, it can be done in about 6 years as against 12 to 15 years for the Nicaraguan route. It is very important that an additional safe passage be provided as early as possible; it is equally important that the larger locks be provided, and quickly.

The beams of our older battleships that have been modernized approach very closely the width of the present canal locks. They make a very tight fit. Our ships now building will make an even tighter fit. The question of wider locks is now a pressing consideration, and the trend of construction in both naval and merchant ships is toward larger and larger vessels. At the end of 6 years, unless this trend is halted or reversed, the present locks will be too small to take the ships that are being completed at that time, unless, of course, we accept ships that are inferior in size and protection to foreign ships which they be called upon to engage in battle. This statement is based upon the needs of national defense and no other consideration.

A great deal has been said today about the danger of air raids. The greatest danger, Mr. Chairman, much more to be apprehended than air raids, is the danger of sabotage. It is that a vessel of a foreign power, an enemy of the United States—wars are not declared now—going through the present locks of the Panama Canal, and being blown up while in those locks. Considerable damage would be made to those locks in that way, much more than could be done by any airplane raid. It is for that reason that it is desired to have locks that are not contiguous to the present locks, that are some distance removed, so far removed that sabotage will not affect the additional locks, and which will provide defenses both against sabotage and against air raids. Also, may I say, that this will provide additional locks that may be used entirely by the Navy. No other ships would be permitted through them in time of war or even if an emergency were remotely possible.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks, and later, when we get into the House, I shall ask unanimous consent to incorporate in these remarks excerpts which I had hoped to be able to present in a 10-minute speech.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLAND. When the bill which authorized the additional locks at Panama became law last year, the President of the United States deemed the work of such importance that an estimate was sent at once to the Senate for the sum of $15,000,000 to be included in the last deficiency bill, but the bill had passed the Senate, and the item was not included. As a result, 1 year of the 6 needed for construction of the locks was lost.

The estimate has again been presented; and if not included now, another year will be lost.

In the colloquy earlier today between certain members of the committee and me it was stated by members of the committee that as 2 years would be needed for certain plans the money was not needed now. If attention is given the testimony of General Ridley, Governor of the Canal, on page 3, it will appear that Governor Ridley, when asked if the engineering plans and specifications were in such shape that he could proceed immediately, said that the plans previously made as the basis for the report to Congress and the investigations related to the foundations and the general outline of the layout of the lock structures, but that the detailed plans have not been started; and it will be necessary, in order to go ahead on the detailed plans, to have the money we are asking for, and that for the locks it would take a couple of years.

Asked as to testimony said to have been given 2 or 3 years ago to the effect that it would take at least 10 years to complete the plans and specifications and the preliminary engineering investigation for additional locks, Governor Ridley said:

I think the statement was a little different from that. It said that it would be carried on over that period. It depends on the rate at which you do the work, and as the lock, from a commercial standpoint, is not needed soon, this work was going to be carried on by a relatively smaller force over a longer period of time.

But after the war situation became more involved, and after conditions in Europe developed, it then became necessary to proceed more rapidly. This third-lock project became a national-defense feature more than a commercial feature, and it was necessary to speed it up.

So we presented a project under which we could do this work in about 6 years. Of course, the locks do not have to be designed at the beginning, because the contracts for them would not be made until the excavation had been finished. So by putting on a larger designing force we figure we can finish that work in 2 years.

In other words, what is stopped by the failure to make the appropriation is the work necessary to make locks usable when installed. It is just the same as if a bridge is to be built and road work done in connection therewith which is essential to that bridge and to work on that bridge.

When the location for the bridge and the general plan for the structure have been fixed, it is not necessary to delay the construction of the road, because detailed plans are not ready for the bridge, which is the last thing to be built. Appropriations for battleships are not delayed until final plans have been prepared.

Recourse to the sketches of the proposed additional locks and bypass channels attached to, and a part of, the letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Governor of the Panama Canal of his investigation of the means of increasing the capacity of the Panama Canal for the future needs of interoceanic shipping, made pursuant to Public Resolution No. 85, Seventy-fourth Congress, will show the plans and how essential it is that preparatory work shall be done now. The letter referred to is House Document No. 210, Seventy-sixth Congress, first session.

Before the work of installing locks can be undertaken there must be construction of camps for workers, railroad construction, electrical construction work, dredging of approaches, land surveys, replacements of aids to navigation, replacement of some Army facilities incident to the work, removal of dirt on the upland, and other items necessary for work on the locks. This is the work covered by the estimates and authorizations which have been rejected. If the detailed plans of the locks were available now, the preparatory work would have to be done and the work could not be advanced; but so long as this preparatory work shall not be done, the facilities needed for national defense must be delayed.

The Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries went very fully into the needs of national defense when it considered the bill which was subsequently enacted into law, and on which the estimate is based.

The Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries heard proponents for, first, the Nicaragua Canal; second, a canal through Panama about 150 miles west of the Panama Canal, known generally as the Chiriqui route; and, third, the Tehuantepec canal through Mexico. After full consideration, the committee on April 26, 1939, reported to the House the bill which subsequently became law. In its report the committee said:

So far as the commercial needs of the canal are concerned, the conclusion was reached that the capacity of the existing locks may be reached by 1961, and additional locks will be needed by that date.

DEFENSE

The Canal must be kept open for transit of the fleet from ocean to ocean, and the locks must be given the maximum possible physical protection from vital damage. An additional system of locks, constructed in locations removed from the present locks, reduces considerably the danger of vital damage, and closing, if need be, the new locks and the bypass channels to all traffic except the Navy would give the highest practicable degree of assurance that no attack on the locks could close the Canal for more than a short period of time.

Careful study and survey was made of the different available locations, and the bypasses proposed will be approximately one-half mile from the Gatun locks, about one-third of a mile from the Pedro Miguel locks, and about one-quarter of a mile from the present Miraflores locks.

All locks will be specially designed to resist air attacks and sabotage. The lock chambers will be of such dimensions as will provide for such future growth in size of vessels as can reasonably be foreseen. The estimates submitted provide for chambers with usable dimensions 1,200 feet long, 135 feet wide, and with 45 feet navigable depth. Approach channels will have minimum width of 300 feet and depth of 40 feet at low water. The exact dimensions will be fixed when detailed plans are drawn, and provision will be made at Gatun and at Miraflores for a highway underpass or bascule bridge. No increase is needed in the existing supply of water for the operation of the proposed locks.

COST

The total estimated cost will be approximately $277,000,000. The increase over the estimate in the 1931 report arises by reason of separate locations, increased prices, larger dimensions, approach channels, and special protective features.

A large amount of preliminary work, including the relocation of railroads and other structures, the provision of rail and highway access to the work, and the extension of housing, water, light, power, sewers, and sanitation to the areas that will have to be occupied by the construction workers can be undertaken whenever funds are made available. Excavation of approach channels should begin at once. It is recommended that $15,000,000 be made available at once.

The item of $15,000,000, which has been approved by the President, Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, by the Budget submitted to Congress and rejected by the Committee on Appropriations, is the item described above in the report of the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

The hearings before the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries contained a statement by Brigadier General Strong, Assistant Chief of Staff, War Plans Division, as follows:

The greatest danger of destruction of any of these canals is sabotage. The next danger is from an air raid. Now, as far as destruction either by sabotage or air raid of one set of locks is concerned, that can adequately be met by another set of locks a short distance away, not necessarily 4 miles, probably 300 yards or 400 yards away would be adequate, because that would be entirely out of range of any destructive effect of a vessel blown up in the locks, or a mine or air bomb. Hence, putting a third set of locks in the canal probably, from a national-defense standpoint, would serve the purpose exactly as well as a new canal some distance away and probably would be very materially cheaper, not only for the initial construction but certainly as far as maintenance of the defense installations is concerned.

Speaking of the additional facilities proposed, General Ridley, Governor of the Canal, when asked how soon the work of construction could commence, if deemed necessary or desirable, said:

We could start construction during the coming year on the excavation only, except we would do a considerable amount of preparatory work, preparing for the work of the contractor, if it is done by contract. For example, the relocation of the railroad at the Atlantic end and construction of drawbridges across the present locks at Miraflores to facilitate construction of the west side of the Canal.

Again:

I can assure you that the locks in this project will be protected in every conceivable way. And I might say here, also, that those locks, if built now, could be kept entirely for the use of our Navy for a considerable period of years, until the traffic increases to the point where we have to use that third set of locks while we are overhauling the old locks.

Speaking of the need for these locks, General Schley, now Chief of Engineers and former Governor of the Canal, said:

The first point I make is that greater protection is needed for the Panama Canal in two respects: First, greater protection for what we now have in the way of installations; and, second, a third set of chambers. And the reason that a third set of chambers is also necessary is, first, that they can be designed in their fundamental features so as to be better capable of protection; and, second, they will be of larger size and therefore can transit larger ships of war; and, third, by their separation from the other two chambers they will have to be separately attacked in order to be destroyed, as well as the others; whereas the other two are so close together that it is possible to conceive a single attack throwing both of them out of commission.

The importance of the Panama Canal in the problem of national defense cannot be exaggerated. Those of us now alive who remember how we waited in 1898 for the arrival of the Oregon in the Caribbean en route from the Pacific are determined that, if possible, the dangers we experienced then shall not be repeated.

Maj. George Fielding Eliot, in his splendid work, The Ramparts We Watch, pointed out that while the United States is not dependent on external communications for its food, nor for any save a few—though some of these are quite important—of the industrial raw materials, saying:

Yet if it were deprived of the use of the sea, if not only its foreign trade but its coastal and intercoastal maritime traffic were interrupted, great hardships would be imposed on its people, and the result, while not as immediately drastic as would be a similar calamity to the British Isles, would assuredly in the end be disastrous.

The United States has no world-girdling colonial empire, yet it does possess outlying possessions, the safekeeping of one of which—the Panama Canal Zone—is absolutely vital to its military security, and of certain others scarcely less than that.

The Panama Canal has been referred to as our lifeline. With it intact we can, in a short time, throw our full naval strength in either ocean. Without it, or without its security assured, we may as well realize, at once, that a two-ocean navy will be demanded by the American people, who will not permit speculation with their defenses.

We cannot afford to take any chances in these perilous days. It is true that 6 years must elapse before we have the security we desire, but every year's delay postpones that security. If we had gotten the appropriation last August when it was requested, we would have been nearer completion by 1 year. If we are to postpone it now for 1 or 2 years, who can say that these defenses may not be needed at an earlier date? All of us desire the security of our country. Of that I am assured. For my part, I will take no chances. I hope the appropriation may be made as approved by the Bureau of the Budget.

I shall offer an amendment to restore the item to the bill. I hope it will prevail. At least I shall have done my duty as I see it.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and Mr. TERRY having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BOEHNE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 8668, and had come to no resolution thereon.

SENATE

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 29, 1940

The Chaplain, Rev. Zebarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, source of all love and wisdom, touch our hearts that we may be filled with the spirit that makes for unity of feeling amidst all diversities of thought. Grant to each one of us at this morning hour a sense of thankfulness for the loveliness of earth, for joy encountered by the way, and knowledge gleaned from hard experience, for Thou has taught us that praise is comely and by it our hearts are enlarged.

Let Thy fiery, cloudy pillar lead the nations of the world out of this wilderness of unrighteous fear and hate into the realm of peace, where love and wisdom shall inspire and govern the lives of men.

O God of peace, strengthen and console us; O God of hope, sustain and uphold us; O God, who art the everlasting fountain whence the living waters flow, rise Thou in the spiritual rock, flow through our deeds and make them pure. In our Saviour's name, we ask it. Amen.

And to amend the title so as to read: "An act to extend until March 4, 1944, the time during which petitions may be filed by farmers under section 75 of the Bankruptcy Act."

Mr. BILBO. Mr. President, I offer for the RECORD House Concurrent Resolution 23, passed unanimously by the Mississippi Legislature, memorializing Congress and the President to establish a military post or camp or fort in the State of Mississippi. This is of especial interest, because, while Mississippi has been a sovereign State of the Union for 123 years, it is the only State east of the Mississippi River which has never had recognition in the establishment of a military post or fort.

On behalf of my colleague the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] and myself, I present the resolution; and also House Concurrent Resolution 5 of the Mississippi Legislature, memorializing the Congress to appropriate funds for the purchase of the home site of Gen. Samuel Dale, who is buried in Mississippi. Because this resolution sets out the high lights of his service to his country, I ask consent that the resolution be published in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be received, appropriately referred, and printed in the RECORD.

To the Committee on Military Affairs:

House Concurrent Resolution 23

Concurrent resolution memorializing the President and the Congress of the United States to establish a Regular Army or military post, fort, or camp in the State of Mississippi

Whereas the State of Mississippi is the only State east of the Mississippi River that does not have a Regular Army, Navy, or military post, fort, or camp within the boundaries of the said State; and

Whereas the United States Government owns thousands and thousands of acres of land in the State of Mississippi where an Army or military post, fort, or camp could be located; and

Whereas at the present time there is great need for national defense in the United States, and millions of dollars are being spent by the United States Government for the purpose of national defense: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Mississippi (the senate concurring therein), That we do petition the President and the Congress of the United States to establish and place a Regular Army or military post, fort, or camp in the State of Mississippi; be it further

Resolved, That the clerk of the house of representatives be instructed to forward a copy of this resolution to the President of the United States and to each of our Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States.

To the Committee on Public Lands and Surveys:

House Concurrent Resolution 5

Concurrent resolution memorializing Congress to appropriate $250,000 for General Samuel Dale National Shrine

Whereas Gen. Samuel Dale was the first member of the Mississippi Legislature from Lauderdale County, Miss., serving with distinguished statesmen and outstanding members; and

Whereas Gen. Samuel Dale is buried in an obscure country graveyard at Daleville, Miss., buried there May 24, 1841; and

Whereas Gen. Samuel Dale fought at New Orleans January 8, 1815, in General Thomas Hinds' Mississippi Dragoons under Gen. Andrew Jackson, and otherwise rendered signal service during Indian troubles in Georgia from 1793 to 1803, during which time he served a part of the time in the Regular United States Army; and

Whereas Gen. Samuel Dale was an outstanding leader against the Lower Creek Indians in Alabama, 1813–14, taking part in many battles along the Alabama River, and later in Seminole Indian troubles in Florida in 1818; and

Whereas Gen. Samuel Dale furnished Gen. Andrew Jackson's army, defending Mobile and New Orleans, 20 barrels of flour, 1,000 bushels of corn, and 5,000 pounds of pork from his own corncrib and smokehouse, with other necessary provisions for which he was never paid by the National Government; and

Whereas, Gen. Samuel Dale, with two other heroes, Jerry Austell and James Smith, rowed by the Negro, Caesar, attacked and slew 12 Indians in the canoe fight, who were on their way down the Alabama River to murder and plunder the white settlers; and

Whereas, Gen. Samuel Dale rode his Indian pony, Paddy, from Milledgeville, Ga., in less than 7½ days with important military despatches for Gen. Andrew Jackson, arriving in time to take part in the battle January 8, 1815, thereby performing the most noted ride for time and distance covered on a single horse in the annals of history; and

Whereas, Gen. Samuel Dale, born in Rockbridge County, Va., October 15, 1772, devoted his entire life to the service of his country in Virginia, Georgia, Mississippi, Alabama, Florida, and Louisiana in one capacity or another, for which he is unhonored and unpaid: Therefore be it Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring therein), That the Mississippi Legislature memorialize the Congress of the United States to pass United States Senate bill No. 1756, introduced by United States Senator THEODORE G. BILBO, appropriating $250,000 with which to purchase two sections of land owned by Gen. Samuel Dale in Lauderdale County, Miss., and on which General Dale is buried, as a national shrine in honor of Gen. Samuel Dale. Said bill is now pending in United States Senate Committee on Lands.

CAPT. JOSEPH A. GAINARD

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I present for appropriate reference a resolution adopted by the city government of Chelsea, Mass., in recognition of the splendid conduct of Capt. Joseph A. Gainard, who was born in that city and who was master of the steamship The City of Flint. I ask also that the resolution be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be received, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and, without objection, printed in the RECORD.

The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That the Board of Aldermen of the City of Chelsea desire to record themselves on behalf of the city of Chelsea as being proud to represent the native city of Capt. Joseph A. Gainard, who so nobly and intelligently handled an international and diplomatic event, which was fraught with possibilities of involving the United States Government with belligerent nations. He rose to the occasion, using only his native intelligence in addition to the culmination of a life of studious application to educational and maritime problems. His conduct, both in the navigation of his ship The City of Flint and his demeanor in dealing with the boarding crew of Germany, stamps him as an outstanding figure which should be recognized by the Federal Government.

The city government congratulates Captain Gainard and, through him, his good family, and records these expressions in the records of this meeting.

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to the President and Vice President of the United States, the Senators from Massachusetts, Congressman Flaherty, Captain Gainard, and Congresswoman Rogers.

FEDERAL MILK REGULATIONS IN BOSTON

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I have recently received a petition signed by about 15,000 constituents, whose names were secured by the Greater Boston Milk Distributors Committee. I understand most of the signatures are those of housewives and were secured by milk drivers for various independent milk dealers in the city of Boston. I am presenting a letter which accompanied the petition and ask that it be printed in the RECORD, and I particularly call attention to one sentence therein, which reads:

It is an audible protest of consumers against a system which raises prices and at the same time tends to eliminate the small milk dealer from competition in the market.

This letter sets forth the milk situation in Boston, and I request that the petition and letter be referred to the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry for the purpose of considering whether any legislation on the subject is desirable, or if, in their opinion, it is considered an administrative matter, that the committee refer the matter to the Secretary of Agriculture.

The letter and petition presented by Mr. WALSH were referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry; and the letter, with an accompanying table, was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SHRIGLEY, EASTMAN & HULL,
Boston, Mass., February 20, 1940.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: On behalf of the Greater Boston Milk Distributors' Committee, I am forwarding to you, under separate cover, a petition. When you open it, it will seem as though I had not given much attention to putting it in an orderly shape, and I apologize for its condition. A scrutiny of it will disclose that it is on so many different kinds of paper, signed on both front and back of the sheets, that it would be very difficult to bind it into any orderly form, as I would have liked to do before sending it to you.

This petition is signed, largely, by housewives, whose signatures were secured by milk drivers for various independent milk dealers in the city of Boston. It is an audible protest of consumers against a system which raises prices and at the same time tends to eliminate the small milk dealer from competition in the market. I believe it might well be said that it is a sort of protest for liberty and as such I commend it for your consideration.

I believe that some 12,000 or 15,000 people have signed the enclosed petitions; I have not counted them. The importance, however, is that this represents a very growing attitude of questioning the regulatory practices of the Government and, therefore, I think it is important for men engaged on behalf of and in the service of the public and the public weal.

The situation in Boston is a serious one in that the Secretary of Agriculture, to maintain a parity price to farmers as provided in the law, has found it necessary to increase the price paid the farmers, effective as of February 1. The order runs until May 1, but I am quite sure that very strenuous objection will be made to a reduction at that time. This arises out of the fact that an artificial price for milk creates a condition under which farmers continually increase production of milk, so that, while the use of milk for food decreases as the price goes up, the surplus which would exist in normal times and under normal conditions constantly increases, and this is all paid for at a parity price through the pool administered by the Federal Market Administrator, the increasing class II milk in the pool requiring constant revision of the base price to be paid to the producer.

This is borne out by the fact that in November of 1937, 45,992,557 pounds of milk were used for human consumption, as food, in the Greater Boston market area. In that same month and year, 14,626,892 pounds of surplus, or class II milk were used on the market. In November of 1938, 47,228,972 pounds of class I milk were used in the market, and 14,798,406 pounds of class II milk, while in November of 1939 the milk used for food had dropped to 43,568,899 pounds, but the surplus, or class II milk, amounted to 21,974,092 pounds. I have used the month of November because it is the month of lowest production.

I enclose to you herewith an analysis covering the period of August 1937 to November 1939, and particularly call your attention to the months of May, June, and July of 1938 and 1939, which are the months of highest production.

As a result of this situation farmers are continually abandoning other forms of agriculture. They are centering on dairying and, some of them, on poultry production. In the face of this situation some of the larger operators are, I am informed, purchasing cream and other milk products from as far west as Adrian, Mich., and probably down into Tennessee, which, when sold on the market, affects the price which would be paid for class II milk. All of this burden comes back to two parties—

1. The consumer, who is now required to pay 14 cents per quart for milk instead of 13 cents.

2. The independent and smaller producer, who is unable, because of lack of equipment, to compete successfully in the sale and handling of the products of class II milk, such as butter, ice cream, cheese, casein, plastics, etc.—with a secondary result which will be disastrous, that as the price goes up the sale of class I milk will decrease; the use of powdered and condensed milk, much of which is produced in semitropic regions like California, where the cows are on open range, at a very low production cost, will supplant the native whole milk which should be used, not only to its present extent but which could be profitably and well used in probably twice its present extent.

The Government, through the Surplus Commodities Corporation, is handling large amounts of milk at a lower price, which milk is being disposed of through welfare agencies at from nothing to 5 or 7 cents per quart. As this occurs, people who would otherwise buy milk from dealers abandon the regular business channels, and the plant and equipment designed to do the normal business lies idle. There is no substantial dealer but who has been finding it necessary to lay off well-paid men and put away perfectly good equipment on account of the effect produced by this particular situation.

You will remember the distress of farmers in the Middle West in 1930–32. Iowa farm lands in 1918 were selling at $400 an acre, and that applied to the whole Middle West region. It all rested on an artificial price supported by Government finance and purchase. When the support was withdrawn the market value of their products after living was not enough to pay the interest on their mortgages, and I doubt if the loss and suffering which was immediately entailed by this situation has been yet ameliorated.

You will pardon this extended letter; the only justification is that I know that you, as our senior Senator, will be deeply concerned about things which a statesman, viewing in the larger perspective, may well know, have, under the guise of apparent prosperity, the latent and obvious seeds of ultimate disaster.

I remain,

Respectfully and sincerely,

JOEL W. EASTMAN.

INDUSTRIAL HYGIENE

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I introduce a bill for appropriate reference, and in connection with the bill I should like to state that its purpose is to provide for the control and prevention of industrial diseases which appear to be greatly on the increase. I have prepared a brief statement in regard to the measure, which I should like to have printed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill of the Senator from Montana will be received and appropriately referred; and, without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The bill (S. 3461) to provide for the general welfare by enabling the several States to make more adequate provisions for the control and prevention of industrial conditions hazardous to the health of employees was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The statement presented by Mr. MURRAY is as follows:

The purpose of this bill is to aid the States in the control of occupational diseases, i. e., disabling conditions from exposures encountered in employment, by effecting better control of these hazards through maintaining special industrial-hygiene units in State labor departments, these industrial-hygiene divisions to function (1) by designing and applying engineering control measures to existing exposures, (2) by aiding in the preparation of suitable rules and regulations for prevention and by directly aiding the enforcement agency charged with the application of the rules and regulations, (3) by aiding the State adjudicating agency in the disposition of workmen's compensation claims.

Occupational diseases occur in all 48 States. Although the extent of damage to workers' health as a result of job hazards varies according to the nature and concentration of industry this is definitely a Nation-wide problem.

No industrial employment is free from conditions capable of causing sickness, disability, and premature death. The industrial worker's life expectancy is 8 to 10 years less than the population at large.

Most seriously exposed are the estimated 5,000,000 workers menaced by specific, reoccurring, recognized occupational diseases, i. e., lead poisoning, dermatitis, silicosis asbestosis, poisoning from benzol, carbon disulfide, mercury, radium, carbon monoxide, and about 20 more.

Increasing use of new chemicals, new solvents, new processes are not only bringing new diseases but are producing an alarming increase in the known health disabilities.

Numerous surveys showing the extent of the hazard have been made. Half of the States recognize from 1 to 31 predominant occupational diseases in Workmen's Compensation Act schedules. Medical techniques have been developed to appraise and sometimes alleviate the damage, but preventive programs are wholly inadequate in some States and nonexistent in others. This is due primarily to insufficient funds available to the responsible enforcement agency, i. e., the State labor departments.

While health departments in the several States have jurisdiction over the public health—contagious diseases, water supply, sewage disposal—this is a general authority not specifically related to industry.

In virtually every State in the Union there has been set up by law a labor department or industrial commission charged with the duty of regulating working conditions and authorized to enter places of employment in the enforcement of labor laws, rules, and regulations. These agencies have specific authority and responsibility with respect to prevention of industrial accident and disease.

In three States—New York, Massachusetts, and Illinois—industrial-hygiene units, which deal exclusively with the science of protecting the workers' health, have been integrated with State labor departments and operate solely on State funds.

Under the Social Security Act of 1935 the Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service has allotted Federal funds to 25 States and 3 city health departments for research in the field of industrial hygiene and sanitation. None of these industrial-hygiene units in the health departments renders service to labor departments in any one of the following ways: (1) Actual enforcement of detailed rules or laws; (2) adjudication of workmen's compensation claims; (3) directly aiding in the formulation of administrative codes, rules, and regulations.

If industrial-hygiene work is to serve a practical purpose other than the mere development of scientific information, it must be carried out by an agency integrated with the Department of Labor, which has full responsibility for and jurisdiction over protecting the health of workers.

CERTIFICATES OF ELECTORAL VOTES

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I introduce a bill which I ask may be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. In connection with the bill I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a brief explanation of the measure.

There being no objection, the bill (S. 3465) relating to certificates of electoral votes was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and the statement in the form of memorandum presented by Mr. GEORGE was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MEMORANDUM

In the original act of March 1, 1792 (1 Stat. 239), providing for the meeting of the electors for President and Vice President, for the counting of the electoral votes, etc., the electors were required to make and sign three certificates of all the votes given by them, seal up the certificates, and certify on each that a list of the votes of their State for President and Vice President were contained therein. This requirement with respect to having the electors certify that the votes of their States are contained in the certificates made by them is still in effect and is now contained in section 139 of the Revised Statutes which reads as follows:

"SEC. 139. The electors shall seal up the certificates so made by them, and certify upon each that the lists of all the votes of such State given for President, and of all the votes given for Vice President, are contained therein."

This requirement has been construed to mean that the electors must all certify to the fact that their certificates contain the correct list of their votes, and that this must be done on the outside of the packages in which the certificates themselves have been sealed. Since the act of May 29, 1928 (45 Stat. 946), six certificates instead of three have been required, and each of them must be so certified.

It is understood that some difficulties have arisen as a result of the failure of some of the electors to place their signatures upon the outside of such packages, and that it is sometimes difficult to get all the signatures of the electors in the short time intervening between the time a copy of the certificate is forwarded to the Vice President and the time fixed by law for counting the electoral votes.

Simplification of the process of certifying to the certificates would therefore seem to be justified, and the proposed bill seeks to accomplish that purpose.

THE RECORD OF THE PAST 7 YEARS—NOTICE OF SPEECH BY SENATOR BARKLEY

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, on Monday next, which will be the seventh anniversary of the inauguration of President Roosevelt and Vice President Garner, I shall seek recognition, immediately upon the conclusion of the morning hour, to address the Senate in a review of the past 7 years. At the conclusion of my address I hope we may proceed, according to an understanding I have with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. HATCH], to consider the bill which has been recently reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and which is known as Hatch bill 2. Following that, if no appropriation bill is ready, we will undertake to consider the so-called cotton cooperative bill, in which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and other Senators are interested.

EXTENSION OF ANTIPERNICIOUS POLITICAL ACTIVITIES ACT

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I had risen to make the same announcement which the majority floor leader has just made concerning Senate bill 3046, Order of Business 1279, which is a bill to extend to certain officers and employees in the several States and the District of Columbia the provisions of the act entitled "An act to prevent pernicious political activities," approved August 2, 1939.

My purpose was merely to notify those Senators that we will endeavor to have the bill taken up on Monday after the address of the Senator from Kentucky, and dispose of it as quickly as possible. In this connection I desire to thank the distinguished majority floor leader for his cooperation in our endeavor to have the bill brought before the Senate for consideration.

COMMENTS BY LUDWELL DENNY ON SPEECH OF JOHN HAMILTON

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, a few days ago Chairman Hamilton, of the Republican National Committee, delivered a speech at Gary, Ind., to the assembled Republican cohorts, at $10 per plate, and struggled to prove that the Republican Party was the great friend of labor. The next day came the pay-off when he announced the appointment of Ernest Weir, the well-known labor hater, to raise the campaign fund for the Republicans this year.

Labor is too smart not to know that Mr. Weir will expect his quid pro quo, and that labor will be the quid. Labor is well advised; but I direct its attention to a Scriptural reference apropos the Gary speech, that labor may not overlook the sword.

The Scripture runs something like this:

> And Joab took Amasa by the beard with the right hand to kiss him.
> But Amasa took no heed to the sword that was in Joab's hand.

I am sure labor will not be diverted, by the flirtations of Hamilton at Gary, from the snickersnee in the form of the person of Ernest Weir.

That alert and well-informed writer on matters pertaining to labor, Ludwell Denny, who writes for the Scripps-Howard syndicate, exposed in an article which appeared in the Washington News of February 27, 1940, the fraud and sham in Mr. Hamilton's speech. I ask unanimous consent that the article may appear in the RECORD as part of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Daily News of February 28, 1940]

FUTILE EFFORT

(By Ludwell Denny)

The effort of Chairman John Hamilton, of the Republican National Committee, to capture the labor vote and to lure back into the party the Republican prodigal, John L. Lewis, is not expected to succeed.

In his speech last night at Gary, Ind., Chairman Hamilton tried to prove that "the Republican Party, throughout its entire history, has been the real friend of labor." To capitalize on the Lewis-Roosevelt split, he said:

"Any attempt to find a short cut to satisfaction and security for labor through a deal with political leadership will prove delusive. Even John L. Lewis is convinced of that now. For weeks now Lewis has been raging at the betrayal of labor by its false New Deal friends."

To prove that the Republican Party is the "real" friend of labor, he cited a legislative record and the (Glenn Frank) Republican program committee report of last week. For the legislative record he used the abolition of Negro slavery and various State laws passed between 1900 and 1916.

As for Federal labor legislation, he claimed Republican credit for the 1932 anti-injunction law. He did not mention that the New Dealers NORRIS and LaGuardia were authors of that bill, which was finally passed by a bipartistn vote after the Republicans had held it up for 5 years.

Child labor has been "virtually eliminated" by the Republican Party, according to Chairman Hamilton. And his party also has "established minimum-wage scales." He cited pre-World War State laws and the unratified child-labor amendment to the Constitution.

But he forgot the Republican vote on the wage-hour law, the Federal measure fixing minimum wages and restricting child labor. The Republican Party did everything it could to prevent passage of that law. In the House the Republicans voted 83 to 6 for recommital, and in the Senate they voted 13 to 2 against its passage.

He also took Republican credit for old-age pension laws—again citing predepression State laws and again neglecting to mention the congressional record. Republicans in the House last year voted less than 2 to 1 against the Townsend plan, while the Democrats voted more than 4 to 1 against it. On the Social Security Act amendment increasing Federal contributions, the Senate Republicans voted 18 to 3 against.

Nor did Chairman Hamilton mention the Republican record on the relief bills—a major issue in the eyes of labor. To kill the relief bill in the last (75th) Congress, Senate Republicans voted 14 to 1 for recommital, and House Republicans voted 79 to 5 for recommittal. In 1936 Senate Republicans voted 13 to 4, and House Republicans 85 to 6, to turn the relief problem back to the States.

The Glenn Frank report on labor issues was repeatedly quoted by Mr. Hamilton to prove that his party is "the real friend of labor." But John L. Lewis does not agree. Mr. Lewis' chief spokesman on legislation, C. I. O. General Counsel Lee Pressman, spoke rather bitterly on this subject just yesterday, as follows:

"This (Glenn Frank) report falsifies the basic facts underlying the problems which have been encountered in connection with the administration of the Wagner Labor Act. * * * This type of attack shows the complete absence of fairness and the real motives of the committee. * * * The goal of this committee, through its report, is to deprive the workers of the protection of the right to organize and bargain collectively, which they now enjoy."

In mentioning the Lewis attack on President Roosevelt, Chairman Hamilton failed to recall that the C. I. O. is divided on this, and that most of the C. I. O. unions which have resolved on this subject have been very pro-Roosevelt. But the C. I. O. is not divided on Ernest T. Weir, the big-steel man just named by the Republicans as chairman of their national finance committee. Mr. Weir is one of labor's pet hates.

Much more than the Hamilton speech and the Glenn Frank report will be required for the Republican Party to get its share of the labor vote in this campaign.

FEDERAL BUREAU OF INVESTIGATION

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, in the Department of Justice and under the direction of the Attorney General is what is called the F. B. I., or the Federal Bureau of Investigation. This Bureau is now and has been in charge of Mr. J. Edgar Hoover as its Director since May 1924.

Human beings are romantic by nature, and in the heart of every person there lurks an ideal. Likewise, in the heart of every person there is a yearning for the dramatic or for something to dramatize or to romanticize. One of the reasons why gangsters in the United States were able for so long to perpetrate their raids was that some persons, indeed some good persons, romanticized the gangster. One of the greatest public services that has been rendered by the Department of Justice through its Federal Bureau of Investigation was to evaporate the romance which in some minds seemed to cluster around gangsters. A large number of worthy persons during the past decade have been engaged in attempting to make the world safe for democracy or to make democracy safe for the world, if you prefer, and during the same period of time Mr. J. Edgar Hoover, as Chief of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, has been engaged in making the United States unsafe for kidnapers.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation is charged with the duty of investigating violations of the laws of the United States, and collecting evidence in cases in which the United States is or may be a party in interest. The organization has a personnel of over 1,600 employees throughout the United States. Under the supervision of the Attorney General, the Director of the Bureau directs the work of the special agents who are employed for the purpose of detecting crime and collecting evidence.

The Attorney General has under his immediate supervision the Identification Division of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which has on file over 5,700,000 sets of fingerprint records of persons who have been arrested in the United States and foreign countries, representing the largest and most nearly complete collection of fingerprint records of current value in existence. In addition, he has under his supervision the Technical Laboratory of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, wherein scientific detection aids are utilized in connection with the solving of crimes under the Bureau's jurisdiction. The experts of this laboratory also assist State and local law-enforcement officials throughout the country in the use of scientific crime-detection aids, such as handwriting and typewriting analysis; the examination of the blood, hair, cloth, soils, and bullets; the use of ultraviolet light in the examination of substances; and the decoding of cryptographic messages.

There is no such thing as the "clueless crime." In every crime, no matter what degree of cunning may be employed or how many times the perpetrator may "double on his track," there invariably remains that which, in the nomenclature of detection and investigation, is called the "dropped stitch." The "dropped stitch" is that inescapable, unavoidable impression, sign, or track made by any and all human activities. To find the "dropped stitch" and then ascertain who dropped it is, of course, the duty and task of all who are engaged in the work of detection and investigation.

The Department of Justice has proved that there is no such thing as a "perfect crime." The Federal Bureau of Investigation in the Department of Justice is equipped, among other apparatus and paraphernalia, with microscopes for examination of bullets and other articles of evidence; an ultraviolet—black light—device for revealing secret writing and identifying stains; chemicals for developing latent fingerprints and analyzing various substances.

The activities of the Federal Bureau of Investigation embrace and comprehend physics; that is to say, that branch of science which deals with biology, chemistry, geology, mechanics, ballistics, electricity, heat, light, and sound. The G-men must be cool, courageous, resourceful, unpurchaseable. They must be trained in psychology—the science of human emotions—and must know what a particular person would be likely to do in given circumstances. The G-man must have a camera eye and a phonographic brain.

Today the laboratory of the Department of Justice in its Federal Bureau of Investigation is housed in rooms especially constructed and equipped to meet the needs of the research experts engaged in the varied phases of criminological study.

So-called perfect crimes are almost daily solved by the test tube, by the microscope, and other intricate instruments of science in the technical laboratories of the Federal Bureau of Investigation in the Department of Justice.

If the so-called gangsters—that is, the unsocial persons—become convinced that detection and punishment follow their unlawful forays, such forays will, if not entirely subside, at least vastly diminish in volume. The unsocial, the malicious, those who try to reap where they have not sown, those who have no regard for human life and who have no regard for the property of others, have found to their dismay that the policy of the Department of Justice was to prosecute with vigor, determination, and success. They—the unsocial—have discovered that behind the criminally disposed persons there follows silently but relentlessly the shadow of retributive justice. One of the master strokes of the F. B. I. was to divest crime of its supposed romance by showing that crime does not pay and that, so far from being romantic or glamorous, crime is instead sordid, low, ignoble, and debased, and that professional criminals are neither brave nor chivalrous nor generous but are cowardly, cruel, and unfair.

There is no honor among thieves; they always sell out one another. In many instances the capture and conviction of the gangster or professional criminal were brought about by clues or evidence furnished to the officers by other gangsters. These professional criminals or so-called gangsters or public enemies desire ease, luxury, money, and excitement. Civilization has been geared up to a point where only men of industriousness, honesty, superior mind, and courage can ever hope to win these prizes legitimately.

The gangster or public enemy possesses none of these attributes and he therefore vainly and illegitimately endeavors to win these prizes.

FEDERAL SURPLUS COMMODITIES CORPORATION

Mr. BILBO. Mr. President, a few days ago the mail brought to my desk a communication from the Association, Southern Commissioners of Agriculture. Those who compose that organization are the officials charged by the statutes of their respective States with caring for agricultural activities in their States.

As the Governor of Mississippi I gained personal knowledge of the type of work done by the commissioners of agriculture. I know they are in daily contact with all classes and types of agricultural producers and processors. Their association has always been keenly alert to matters pertaining not alone to the production but to the processing, marketing, and distribution of agricultural products native to their States.

While we in Congress may be cognizant of local facts, we are compelled to legislate on a broad, national scale when legislating in behalf of agriculture. We, however, must at the same time be concerned with hundreds of other problems having to do with national affairs.

The State commissioners of agriculture, on the other hand, are veritably standing in the furrows of the plow. Thus they are able not alone to vision but to assess the results of the legislation which we may contemplate enacting, or the results which might flow from the legislation already enacted. They are thus peculiarly in position to express to us the wish and the desire of practically every individual farmer or farming area of the States which they serve.

Whenever they address the Members of this body we are well assured that it is on some matter of vital importance to American agriculture.

Since I was elected to this body I have noted that as an organization they have not alone consistently given constructive criticism but also active support to every piece of agricultural legislation passed by Congress. I was therefore interested at once in the subject matter of the communication recently received.

On this occasion they wrote with reference to the reduction made by the House in the appropriation budgeted by the President in the 1941 Budget for the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation.

That appropriation, as recommended in the Budget by the President, was stricken from the supply bill on a point of order made and sustained in the House.

Mr. President, the farmers of the State of Mississippi, our cotton planters, those engaged in the livestock, dairy, and citrus-fruit industries, our truck gardeners, and I myself are all vitally interested in exhibiting and disclosing the false economy practiced by the House in striking that appropriation from the Agricultural supply bill.

I had intended to address the Senate at length on the wisdom of restoring that appropriation and now serve notice that I may address this body when that subject matter comes before the Senate.

I desire now, however, to take but a few minutes to indicate to my colleagues the activities of the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation and to point out that they are indeed of vital importance not alone to the farmers and planters of the State of Mississippi and the agricultural Southland but that they are equally important to our national agriculture as a whole, as well as our national welfare in general.

Americans everywhere are in agreement that the administration program for the economical, equitable, and humanitarian disposal of existent surplus food is factually, fundamentally, economically, agriculturally, and socially sound.

To make available the surplus of the products to our needy is a humanitarian program, and to supply the patent needs of our people on relief should continue to transcend every other governmental activity and constitute in these times the very front line of our national defense.

No conscientious, clear-thinking Senator will fail to react to the pleas that the appropriation recommended for the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation be restored once he has read the economic arguments set forth by the southern commissioners in their plea for the restoration of that appropriation.

Mr. President, I am glad that the chairman of the subcommittee which has this matter under consideration, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL], has come into the Chamber, because the communication from the Association, Southern Commissioners of Agriculture, is addressed to the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

No piece of legislation enacted by the Congress in the last decade so fully comprehends the problems of agricultural production, distribution, and consumption of our surplus crops of food and surplus raiment as does the activity set up by section 32 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1935.

Let me digress for a moment to read a short excerpt from the communication sent by the southern commissioners. In this they declare that:

"Since Congress established that agency (the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation), no one any longer reads in the daily press of surplus beans, lettuce, spinach, cabbage, carrots, potatoes, or turnips being dumped into irrigation ditches in the Rio Grande Valley, the bayous of Louisiana and Mississippi, or the drainage canals in the State of Florida, while millions of the unemployed were either stark with hunger, or subsisting on a diet far below the level of abject poverty.

"Thanks to the congressionally established Surplus Commodities disposal program, surplus oranges, grapefruit, apples, and pears no longer rot in our orchards, through lack of economic distribution."

"Our farmers—"

Write the Southern Agricultural Commissioners—

"have now stopped feeding milk and even eggs to their hogs, while undernourished and underfed children starved in our schools or suffered the pangs of hunger in the sweltering slums of the great metropolitan areas."

Mr. President, apropos that argument, an article by Stuart Chase was published in a recent issue of the Cosmopolitan, which dealt with the program and activities of the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation.

In order graphically to pictorialize and exhibit the activities of that corporation, Mr. Chase asked his readers to imagine a solid freight train 1,600 miles long, stretching practically from the Nation's Capital in Washington to the city of Denver, Colo.

He further asked his readers to imagine that train after it had been loaded down by our farmers with 5,000,000,000 pounds of indispensable surplus commodities of our farms—surplus supplies of pork products, lard, butter, eggs, cheese, milk, cereals such as wheat, corn, and oats, fresh vegetables and fruits, and to picture 15,000,000 underfed American men and women lined up against that train with baskets, waiting to carry off their portion of its supplies to supplement the diets of their underprivileged children as well as themselves.

That, said Stuart Chase, constitutes a picture of but a fraction of the work being done by the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation.

Think of the help it has given to the producers. Think of the work it has furnished railroad employees; the increased business to the storekeeper, and labor to the shop clerk; think with me of the God-given help that it has afforded to the hungry.

Mr. President, for some time the Congress has been discussing the aid and succor which might be afforded to the hopeless peoples in the war-stricken areas of distant lands.

While that question was being debated and discussed I was thinking of the people of my own State of Mississippi who are deprived even now of the benefits which would accrue to them by virtue of the "orange and blue stamp plan" placed into effect in other areas throughout the United States.

I called upon Mr. Milo Perkins to make request that his agency look to the possibilities of extending the activities of his agency to my State. While Mr. Perkins was explaining why they had been unable to do so, he showed me communications from more than 400 cities and towns in the country making similar requests.

I will say that since that time one of these stamp plans has been established in Mississippi.

Almost simultaneously with my visit to Mr. Perkins the House struck from the supply bill the funds budgeted and necessary to carry out that program, even in the towns in which it is now operating.

Mr. President, as a first measure of our national defense Congress should do everything within its power to continue to remove the overburdening surplus of foods and fiber from our agricultural producers.

While I, for one, am not disposed to oppose any plan for assisting the needy in other lands, I would a thousand times rather see the export subsidy on surplus crops abandoned, if that be necessary, in order to continue the distribution of the surplus of perishable foods among the undernourished and the underprivileged citizens in our own country. In doing that we would at the same time restore economic health and well-being to our land. That restoration should constitute the primary program and be the first concern of every Member of this body.

It is unnecessary for me to elaborate upon the valuable services rendered to the producers of cotton, tobacco, and wheat by reason of the export programs put into effect by the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation.

The benefits of the surplus removal and distribution program accrue, however, to all types of agriculture. These include the producers as well as processors, transporters, and marketers of field and row crops, as well as the livestock, dairy, orchard, garden vegetables, fruit, and poultry producers.

The program directly benefits a class of farmers and producers who derive no specific Federal assistance under the Agricultural Adjustment Act, or any parity payments other than those directly traceable to the Corporation's activities. These activities provide a sort of "agricultural adjustment act" for the producers of all other crops than the so-called basic crops.

Mr. President, thousands of millions of pounds of buttermilk, lard, garden vegetables, fresh and sweet potatoes, apples, apricots, cherries, figs, grapes, pears, and raisins have been acquired in thousands of purchases made in hundreds of pricing markets on scores of occasions.

These products are acquired when the presence of surplus marketings of specific crops in specific pricing markets threatens the normal market-price structure for the particular commodity in every market of the United States.

The disposal of the surplus food accumulated and distributed through the orange- and blue-stamp plan has not alone insured a more abundant supply of wholesome meats, vegetables, fruits, poultry, eggs, milk, and cheese to those on relief, but at the same time has increased the purchasing power of all American farmers for city-made industrial products.

It is practically impossible to evaluate or exhibit statistically the true value to our national welfare comprehended in this program. However, it is to be remembered that the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation established by Congress is ever on guard to enter the market when a small investment of the funds entrusted to its disposal would save an existent price structure threatened by the seasonal or daily receipt of an overabundant supply at pricing markets. Even the smallest purchase can often give strength to the buying market throughout the entire area affected.

As I have previously stated, I shall discuss this matter further when the bill comes before the Senate.

Mme. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a communication from the Association of Southern Commissioners of Agriculture, including a short table contained therein, showing the amount and kinds of food purchased and disposed of to date. I ask Members of the Senate to read at their leisure the report submitted by the commissioners of agriculture of the Southern States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mrs. CARAWAY in the chair). Is there objection?

There being no objection, the communication was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ASSOCIATION, THE SOUTHERN COMMISSIONERS OF AGRICULTURE,
Washington, D. C., February 12, 1940.

The Honorable RICHARD B. RUSSELL,
Chairman, the Senate Committee on Agriculture, United States Senate Appropriations Committee.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The Association, Southern Commissioners of Agriculture, are addressing you and through you the United States Senate Committee on Appropriations.

They are in this instance doing so with reference to the agricultural appropriations bill now before your committee and specifically with reference to the amount of moneys to be made available to the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation, not alone for carrying on but for making possible the expansion of its corporate activities.

The Association, Southern Commissioners of Agriculture, is a nonprofit association, having no associate or other types of memberships. It was organized with a view to furthering the interests of the agricultural producers, processors, and allied industries in States represented within the association.

As the commissioners of agriculture of the Southern States we are speaking in behalf of that agricultural area comprehending all of the great Southland the occupation of whose people is predominantly agricultural. While the main cash crops historically produced have been cotton, tobacco, peanuts, and rice, our geographical location, climatological and soil conditions, the vast expanse of our woodland pastures, and good water, coupled with a safe, sound, diversified farming program followed for the last decade, makes the South today one of the most diversified agricultural areas in the United States.

It is because of these factors read in the light of our historical background that we take this opportunity of advising the United States Senate Committee on Appropriations that after incursive researches the Association, Southern Commissioners of Agriculture, are agreed that there is no activity now being carried on by the Federal Government which has been or promises to be of greater benefit to our southern or to American agriculture in general, as do the programs currently being projected by the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation.

These research studies have factually disclosed that the economic benefits of the work being carried on by the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation accrue to all types of agriculture, including the producers of field and row crops, livestock, orchard, garden vegetables, fruit, and poultry producers.

These action programs are of even greater significance. The Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation activities directly benefit a class of farmers and producers who derive no specific Federal assistance under the Agricultural Adjustment Act other than those directly traceable to the Corporation's activities. This makes these activities a sort of an Agricultural Adjustment Act for that class of producers.

The original policy adopted by the Corporation was primarily designed to widen markets, and, secondly, to remove surplus.

This comprised two distinct programs. These were:

I. The export program.

II. The program to increase domestic distribution and consumption of surplus crops.

Both were projected to assist the farmer in the orderly marketing of agricultural commodities, which surplus otherwise would have seriously debased domestic prices.

The Association, Southern Commissioners of Agriculture, would advance their findings which indicate that economically, agriculturally, and socially sound the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation exemplifies the most fundamental type of all current governmental activities. Complementing the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938, it has not alone developed a system for the orderly marketing of agricultural crops but it has in addition thereto done a vast amount of work which has actually resulted in the increased consumption of overburdening agricultural surpluses.

It is the firm conviction of the southern agricultural commissioners that there is no single item requested in the Budget submitted by the President which can be more readily justified, from either the agricultural or sociological standpoint, than the appropriation budgeted for the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation.

The amount asked for the continuation of this work is negligible when compared with the incalculable benefits which would flow out of this appropriation, not alone to our great farm population but in behalf of the underprivileged citizens of the country as a whole, hitherto existent on a diet even below that of the level of poverty.

Moreover, it is strictly in line with the declared purpose of the Congress, expressed on more than one occasion, to bestow equal benefits upon producers and consumers alike.

In passing the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 Congress declared:

"The purpose of this act is to assist in the marketing of agricultural commodities for domestic consumption and export and to assist consumers to obtain an adequate and steady supply of such commodities at fair prices."

The southern agricultural commissioners would point out to the Senate Committee on Appropriations that conditions identical with those which caused the Congress of the United States to declare its purpose at that time are present in our country today. They submit the fact that the Congress intended and declared in that act to set up the medium whereby the Government might aid the farmers in disposing of their surplus commodities to those in need in order that the commodities might be distributed orderly among consumers.

It is unnecessary to indicate to your committee the assistance rendered the producers of cotton, tobacco, and wheat by virtue of the export programs put into effect by the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation.

The marked decline in cotton exports as of July 1, 1939, were met by the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation export of approximately 2,500,000 bales. This was an amount of cotton equivalent to approximately 66 percent of the total cotton exports for the preceding year.

As it was with cotton, so it was with wheat. It became increasingly apparent that American producers would not be able to continue the normal sales of wheat and wheat flour in our export trade without some form of Government assistance. This was in a large measure attributable to the fact that other leading wheat-producing nations of the world were already subsidizing their exports of that commodity. The sale of our surplus exportable wheat crop was in jeopardy. The subsequent exports of nearly 100,000,000 bushels of wheat out of our country is directly due to the assistance rendered by the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation.

The southern agricultural commissioners now take opportunity of pointing out to the Senate Committee on Appropriations the enormous advantage and help which the tobacco farmers of this country received from the funds made available to use by the Commodity Credit Corporation. They plead in behalf of the tobacco growers that the limited permanent appropriation made available be supplemented this fiscal year in accordance with the recommendations made by the President in his Budget.

First among those to suffer from the results of the European conflict was the American tobacco grower. In the very midst of the marketing of last year's crop foreign buyers withdrew from our domestic markets. Sales were stopped. Warehouses were closed. The business of marketing tobacco was paralyzed.

The flue-cured-tobacco farmers then faced immediate financial disaster. But there stood that congressionally established function of the Government, the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation. Stepping into the breach, they summoned the British tobacco buyers back into our domestic markets. They made arrangements under which the buyers continued to purchase their usual requirements and thus prevented the complete collapse of tobacco prices in the United States.

Under these agreements the Commodity Credit Corporation provided $38,000,000 and took title to the tobacco. They are holding it under option, which was by the agreements extended to the British buyers, and which they may exercise at any time between now and July 1, 1941.

May we now submit the observation that if such an activity is now to be handicapped on account of a lack of funds that distress and bankruptcy might soon envelop those who live in the tobacco country.

The Southern Agricultural Commissioners would address the attention of the members of the Agricultural Committee on Appropriations to the fact that the activities of the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation have in no way been confined to activity on such basic crops as wheat and cotton.

The American livestock producer, potato farmer, rice grower, cotton and wheat planters, to say nothing of the fruit and vegetable growers, have been the recipients of its beneficence.

It is a well-established economic fact that the consumption of dairy and poultry products, as well as of fruits and vegetables, increase and decrease in ratio with consumer income; that when income is low the low-income group will go short on the consumption of these commodities, even though diet and health may suffer.

A greater opportunity for conserving the health of the American under-privileged family adult, as well as child, was never more present than it is today. This condition is being both economically and successfully met by the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation, which has made possible the purchase and disposition of foodstuff to the low-income group of our people.

Through the orange- and blue-stamp plan not alone have they insured a more abundant supply of wholesome meats, vegetables, and fruits, of poultry and eggs, of milk, and of cheese, but have at the same time increased the purchasing power of the American farmer for city-made industrial products.

It is practically impossible to evaluate or exhibit statistically the true value to our national welfare comprehended in this program. It is to be remembered, however, that the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation as established by Congress is ever on guard to enter the market when a small investment of the funds entrusted to their disposal would save an existent price structure threatened by a seasonal or daily receipt of an overabundant supply at pricing markets. Even the smallest purchase can often give strength to the buying market throughout the entire area affected.

Not alone has their purchases directly enhanced the farm income, but they have been and still are of incalculable benefit to the producers of those commodities by way of maintaining or achieving at least in part "a parity of price" between the goods which the farmers buy and the goods which farmers sell.

Millions of pounds of apples, apricots, cherries, figs, grapes, pears, and raisins have been acquired in thousands of purchases made in hundreds of pricing markets on scores of occasions. The acquisition of these products were made when the presence of a surplus crop in that pricing market threatened the normal market price structure for that particular commodity in every market of the United States.

With the coming of the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation the sun no longer rises on the day when we would read in the newspapers of agricultural crops, of garden vegetables, such as spinach, cabbage, tomatoes, peppers, potatoes, etc., being dumped into irrigation ditches while underprivileged children in the sweltering slums of our metropolitan areas were languishing for want of food and nourishment.

Agreeable to the marketing programs conducted by the Department of Agriculture in connection with the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation program, the production of American garden truck has been brought more into line with the economic food and diet requirements of our people.

It is only if and when an abnormal production of crops might flow into the terminal markets and depress that day's price that this Federal agency steps in, acquires a reasonable supply of those commodities, and puts a floor as it were, under the price by the orderly marketing of the normal requirements of our people.

Not the least among the beneficiaries of the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation has been the dairy industry of the United States. Ninety-five million pounds of butter, 22,000,000 pounds of cheese, 1,000,000 pounds of condensed milk, 64,000,000 quarts of fluid milk have been removed in hundreds of individual purchases from scores of pricing markets on innumerable days when surplus receipts would have threatened the price structure of the products of the dairy industry.

Our southern poultry producer likewise has benefited tremendously by the work in having his egg market relieved of an overburdening supply of eggs, through the purchase of more than 269,000,000 cases in eastern, southern, central, and Pacific markets, by the activity of this Corporation.

The potato grower; the California raisin, prune, and fig industry; American producers of tomatoes, both canned and fresh; the potato growers of both Irish and sweetpotatoes, have been directly benefited. These have benefited not alone through the acquisition of potatoes for use on the table of the undernourished and underprivileged Americans, but through the acquisition of potato flour and starch to the extent of more than 2,500,000 pounds in the calendar year of 1938 alone.

Nothing could be more expressive and indicative of the economic as well as popular endorsement and support of the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation food-stamp plan than the fact that requests have been made by more than 400 cities in the United States, asking that this type of Federal aid be made available to their underprivileged and undernourished people.

This food-stamp program consists of the direct distribution of the overburdening surplus of farm crops to needy families. With 20,000,000 of our citizens now dependent upon Federal and State relief, the need for the continuation of such a program becomes more evident.

The inception of this program sprang from the representatives of organized agriculture. Realizing their own helplessness of moving their surplus products economically into consuming markets they grouped with the American grocers, processors, transportation representatives as well as the representatives of distribution and finance.

In order to get the disposition of surplus foods in our domestic market quickly under way, organized agriculture sought the assistance of both wholesalers and retailers everywhere. The response was tremendous. Demonstration programs were set up. The results are too well known to be elaborated upon.

Federal surveys of typical American families on relief had disclosed the fact that the average family spent but $1 per week, or 15 cents per day, per person, for food. That meant that some 20,000,000 of our citizens were, and except where the "food stamp" program is operating today, are living on the meager sum of 5 cents per meal.

The amount proposed in the Budget for the operation of this particular program of the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation was predicated on the possibility of expanding the amount spent per person for food, from $1 per week to $1.50 per week, or the sum of 7½ cents per meal.

The leaders of commerce and transportation agree that while the added food consumption is of great help for farmers by consuming their surplus production, that it is also a program of great import to the businessmen and workers of our cities. The primary import, however, is to the needy families themselves. While advanced primarily as an agricultural measure this activity involving the subsidizing of the consumption of foods has actually been made necessary, by the unemployment of our people. Its activities will be curtailed as the level of employment increases.

There was an article published in a recent issue of the Cosmopolitan magazine dealing with action programs of the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation, written by Mr. Stuart Chase.

In order to graphically pictorialize and exhibit the activities of that Corporation, Mr. Chase asked his readers to imagine a solid freight train 1,600 miles long, stretching practically from the Nation's Capital in Washington to the city of Denver, Colo.

He asked his readers to imagine that train loaded down with 5,000,000,000 pounds of rich, indispensable surplus hogs, lard, butter, eggs, cheese, milk, fresh vegetables and fruits. To picture 15,000,000 underfed American men, women, and children lined up against that train with baskets, waiting to carry off their portion of its foods to supplement their own diet and larders.

That, wrote Stuart Chase, is but a fraction of the work done by the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation. Think of its help to the producers! To the railroad workers! To the storekeeper and the shop clerk! To the hungry!

Today with warehouses bursting with cotton, our granaries overflowing with wheat and corn, with our pork and our lard selling at the lowest price in almost a decade, with millions of our people underclothed as well as underfed, it would seem to any ordinary mind that the primary job of our generation is to get a plentiful supply of the foods which we have on hand, foods indispensable to human life, into the hands of those who would readily buy them if only they could find gainful employment to make possible their purchase.

The President and the Congress of the United States have already, in part, solved this problem. The complete solution, however, will take even more time. There will be newer and even further difficulties to overcome.

In the meantime, however, the southern agricultural commissioners congratulating Congress upon its work along those lines would inform the Senate Committee on Appropriations that so far as food and clothing are concerned, the citizenship of our Nation is united in their wish and determination to see that our underfed and our underclothed are given every possible effort to consume our surplus products of fats, foods, and fiber.

Estimates have been made and there exists in the United States a potential market, annually, for an extra 300,000,000 pounds of butter, about 352,000,000 dozen eggs, over 25,000,000 bushels of wheat, 6,000,000 bushels of corn in the form of meal, 140,000,000 pounds of rice, 87,000,000 pounds of prunes, and about 227,000,000 pounds of dry beans which could be put into the channels of trade by way of the "stamp plan."

For fresh fruits and garden vegetables there is also a tremendous potential market. Given opportunity, our low-income groups would buy trainloads of citrus, tomatoes, cabbage, peaches, and other fruits and vegetables.

From a purely agricultural standpoint, these figures have even far greater significance. The Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation now makes possible a much more uniform and broader market for farmers producing commodities for which there is an elastic demand. These include such foods as dairy products, poultry, fruits, and vegetables. The early figures obtained where stamps have been used indicate sharp increases in the consumption of rice and beans and give a more hopeful outlook for these crops than was anticipated.

It is planned that the commodities included on the surplus list will change from time to time. In addition to the usual seasonal factors, disturbed world conditions may affect the variety of commodities. On the other hand, there are adequate, and in many instances, surplus supplies of a great many nutritive foods which can be expected to remain on the list. Commodities, such as citrus fruits and pork products were added during the latter half of the year 1939.

The wider distribution planned for the fiscal year 1940 would do more than provide a new market for surpluses; ultimately it would bring about a better price level for the entire crop harvested, especially in the case of those commodities which might be selling much below parity in the coming year.

As this is being written the hog lard and cottonseed oil question is very acute. With our greatest customer, Germany, out of the market for as much as 325,000,000 pounds annually, and with a tremendous production of lard now coming into market—special treatment will have to be accorded that commodity. Hog-lard prices are already so depressed as to find some of that precious food being fed to the soap kettles.

Lard already on the surplus list is scheduled for expanded purchase and if more pork products were acquired later in the year, the outlet for corn would be increased. Were it but possible for the stamp plan to operate on a national basis and with livestock products included on the surplus list, a highly significant market would be opened for our farmers in the Corn Belt.

Following is a representative table. It discloses the percentage of distributions of what were declared to be surplus commodities under the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation stamp plan.

But five cities of the United States are set forth in this table. Based upon these tables it appears that about one-quarter of all stamps are being used for butter, another one-quarter for eggs—two products produced throughout the entire country.

About 10 percent of the added purchasing power is being used for wheat products and approximately 31 percent being divided among the fresh fruits and vegetables, according to the consumer's selection and the commodities which have been on the list thus far.

Corn meal, rice, dry beans, and dried prunes are each receiving over 2 percent of the stamp expenditure as a result of the new buying by our needy families.

NOTE.—City distribution weighted by the number in May 1939, receiving public assistance in States surrounding these cities.
Authority: Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation, Sept. 15, 1939.

The Senate Committee on Appropriations might as a statistical curiosity speculate as to the increased market for agricultural commodities which would be ours if only the program was Nation-wide. Think of the potential market if every eligible family throughout the Nation were permitted to increase their purchases and diets on the same basis as in the cities mentioned above.

The Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation is operating a project that has a program that offers a real hope to our Nation and one that should be extended. Certainly it should not be curtailed. It is the one medium devised to date whereby the hungry people of this Nation can actually consume some of the surplus food produced by our farmers.

As heretofore stated, more than 400 American communities have made requests upon the Federal Government to enable them to avail their areas of the splendid services of the Federal Surplus Commodity Corporation. Thus does it become patent that it is not alone enough that these benefits should be maintained in the particular cities which enjoy them today, but rather we should insure the fact that every American should know and enjoy to the fullest measure an improved diet resulting from the distribution of the commodities of the farmers, ever burdened by the surplus of his products.

With the appropriations curtailed as they have been by an excess of $72,000,000 below Budget estimates, it will be absolutely impossible to expand the beneficent influence and activities of the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation.

The Southern Agricultural Commissioners take this opportunity of informing the Senate Committee on Appropriations that they do not believe it to be the sense of the American people that the drastic reduction made in this supply bill by the House should apply to an activity furnishing bread and meat and clothes to hungry American citizens.

This is one program which has done away with the fact that we hitherto existed as a nation possessed of warehouses bursting with food, while our own peoples were going hungry.

Following is a list of purchases of the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation in surplus-removal operations, by commodities, from the latest reports available, to wit, June 1938.

Authority: Agricultural Statistics for 1939, U. S. Department of Agriculture.

The second World War has had marked effect upon our domestic agricultural situation. Some farm prices which were at abnormally low levels during the late summer have advanced but are still too low to bring about a situation where the returns to our farmers are in line with the fair exchange values with the industrial and city goods which farmers buy.

As long as this condition exists and as long as there are millions of our citizens with inadequate diets, the Southern Agricultural Commissioners would urge that ample funds be made available to the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation in order that they may extend their food-stamp plan to sections of the country where it has not as yet been placed in operation.

Our farmers realize full well that they have in the past and could in the future prosper greater by selling their products to men with good jobs than they can to men by a mere 7½ cents worth of food per meal through the activities of the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation.

A man with a good job and good wages provides a greater and a more profitable market for the farmer than does an unemployed man. Times of great agricultural surpluses are usually accompanied by increased unemployment. During our recent economic crisis the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation, created by Congress, was there to do the minimum job in terms of minimum cost for insuring diets below which the public health would have been endangered. The broader markets which their purchases made possible to our farmers in times of stress have helped to stabilize not alone the agricultural economy but the sociological and economic welfare of the entire Nation.

The Association, Southern Commissioners of Agriculture therefore ask the Appropriations Committee of the Senate to believe with them that this is not the time for the retrenchment contemplated by the economy effected. In times of less unemployment the appropriations could and should be restricted to the fewer families who might still be in need of such assistance.

Therefore the Association, Southern Commissioners of Agriculture, urge the Senate Committee on Appropriations to restore the sum of $72,678,812 to the funds available for use by the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation in acquiring and disposing of surplus agricultural products in accordance with section 32 of the Agricultural Adjustment Act.

Every American citizen inherently feels the heavy responsibilities reposed upon us because of the second World War. Our Government is at this very moment being urged to afford aid and assistance to certain of the belligerents. Without attempting to assess the merits or the wisdom of such proposal, the Association, Southern Commissioners of Agriculture, recognize the present world emergency as a challenge to every group in the United States of America.

Already we have responded as private citizens to the call for help and succor for the needy and distressed noncombatant population as well as the women and children of foreign lands. The income, however, of many of our people below even the poverty level border closely upon what some are wanting to describe as the revolutionary level.

It is becoming more potent daily that it is up to us in America to prove to our own people as well as to the world that we as a nation are capable of making economic democracy work for the good of all without resort to the methods of the totalitarian powers.

It is difficult for many people to ponder upon the fact that Congress is concerned with the possibilities of doing something for other nations of the world, while at the same time we contemplate "economy" in so elemental a matter as would enable our own people to increase their budgets for food from 5 cents a meal to 7½ cents a meal by making use of a food supply already in existence.

Of a certainty there are other items in the Budget for 1941 not a tithe as essential to human life as is the appropriation proposed by the President for the use of the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation.

One of the most constructive pieces of legislation ever passed by Congress, this goes right to the heart of the agricultural and social problem. From an agricultural standpoint the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation appropriation is one of the most important items carried in this year's Budget, because under its provisions the producer and the consumer—in this case the overburdened farmer and the undernourished on relief—derive equal benefits from the provision of the stamp plan.

The front line of American defense will find little defense in providing food for the fighting forces of Finland. The main lines of our defense lie on the American farms and will be made most effective by providing an ample diet for the underprivileged on relief.

Following is a statement exhibiting the amounts of money available for use by the Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation fiscal year 1940, contrasted with the funds available in the fiscal year 1941.

The Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation has heretofore derived its funds from two sources:

1. By way of section 32, which makes available 30 percent of the annual customs receipts.

2. By way of direct congressional appropriations.

Amount available for use by Federal Surplus Commodities Corporation in the fiscal year 1940:
1. By way of customs receipts	$92,678,812
2. By way of congressional appropriation	113,000,000
Total available for use in 1940	205,678,812
Budget estimate for year 1941:
1. By way of customs receipts	100,000,000
2. By way of appropriations	72,678,812
Total amount requested for 1941	172,678,812
Available for use in 1941 as per House bill:
1. By way of customs receipts	100,000,000
2. By way of appropriations	None
Total for 1941	100,000,000
Restore to the supply bill the sum of	72,678,812

It is because of the above that the Association, Southern Commissioners of Agriculture, endorse the following amendment offered by the Honorable STEPHEN PACE, Third District, Georgia.

This amendment offered in the House was ruled out on a point of order. Request is here made that it be restored to the agricultural supply bill for 1941.

Amendment offered by Mr. PACE: On page 77, at the end of line 19, add a new paragraph as follows:

"To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to market agricultural commodities for domestic consumption and for export as authorized by the Agricultural Adjustment Act of 1938 and the declared policy of the Congress as set forth in said act; to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase and distribute surplus agricultural commodities for relief purposes as provided in section 204 of said act; to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to make other payments authorized by section 391 of said act, that is, payments in assisting consumers to obtain an adequate and steady supply of such commodities; and to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to administer and carry out the purposes of said act and the declared policy of the Congress in the enactment thereof, $72,678,812: Provided, That not in excess of 25 percent of the funds herein made available may be devoted to any one agricultural commodity."

Respectfully submitted.

THE ASSOCIATION SOUTHERN COMMISSIONERS OF AGRICULTURE,
C. C. HANSON, Secretary.

MARITIME TRAINING SCHOOL—ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.

Mr. PEPPER. Mme. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Calendar No. 1276, Senate Joint Resolution 198, to authorize the United States Maritime Commission to acquire certain lands at St. Petersburg, Fla., for the purpose of constructing a maritime training school as an adjunct to the Coast Guard station at that point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida? The Chair hears none.

Mr. PEPPER. I ask unanimous consent that House Joint Resolution 424, which is identical with Senate Joint Resolution 198, be substituted and presently considered instead of the Senate joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 424) to authorize the United States Maritime Commission to acquire certain lands at St. Petersburg, Fla.

Mr. PEPPER. Mme. President, I offer an amendment on page 2, line 1, after the word "lot", to strike out "4" and insert in lieu thereof "6." The figure "4" is merely an error in the description of the lot.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the United States Maritime Commission is hereby authorized, with funds in the construction fund of the Commission, to acquire on behalf of the United States by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, and pay all costs incident to the examination, transfer, and perfecting of title to that certain tract of land aggregating ten and five one-hundredths acres, more or less, situated and being in the county of Pinellas, State of Florida, together with the structures thereon, described as follows:

Beginning at the southeast corner of lot 6, block 22, Bayboro Addition, as recorded in plat book 3, pages 51 and 52, records of Pinellas County, Fla.; thence run south along the west line of Asbury Street South to a point two hundred and seventy-seven and forty-one one-hundredths feet south; thence southeast on an angle of forty-five degrees to the left a distance of nine hundred and sixty-nine and sixteen one-hundredths feet; thence east on an angle of forty-four degrees fifty-seven minutes to the left a distance of three hundred and ninety-five and four-tenths feet; thence northwest on an angle of one hundred and twenty-four degrees forty-two minutes thirty-four seconds to the left a distance of nine hundred and seventy and thirty-eight one-hundredths feet to the farthest southwest corner of the wharf of the port of St. Petersburg, Fla.; thence west on an angle of fifty-five degrees sixteen minutes twenty-six seconds to the left a distance of three hundred and forty-three and eighty-five one-hundredths feet to the west line of First Street South; thence north on said west line of First Street South and on an angle of eighty-nine degrees fifty-six minutes to the right a distance of one hundred and sixty-four and three-tenths feet to the southeast corner of lot 4, block 23, said Bayboro Addition; thence west on an angle of eighty-nine degrees forty-six minutes forty-two seconds to the left and on the south line of said lot 4, block 23, and continue west to the west line of Asbury Street South a distance of one hundred and eighty-five feet to the point of beginning, all of said tract lying and being in the city of St. Petersburg, county of Pinellas, State of Florida.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, Senate Joint Resolution 198 is indefinitely postponed.

FOREIGN TRADE PROGRAM

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mme. President, at this time I wish briefly to mention a subject which is of interest to the Members of this body, particularly those who come from our great agricultural sections, and more particularly those States which are engaged in the production of cotton and tobacco. I see Representatives of those States present in the Chamber. Those to whom I particularly refer are the Senators from Georgia, the Senators from Kentucky, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD].

The States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Kentucky are particularly interested in the agricultural situation as it affects the production and marketing of cotton and tobacco, because those States produce more cotton and tobacco than any other four States in the Union, when we consider the two products combined.

I have clipped from the columns of the Washington Times-Herald an article entitled "Allies Trade Bias Admitted by Wallace; Defends Hull's Program Before Senate Group." The article reads:

Henry F. Grady, Assistant Secretary of State, and Henry A. Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, conceded in response to questions by members of the Senate Finance Committee yesterday that British and French discriminations against American agricultural products are confronting the administration's reciprocal trade agreements program with serious difficulties.

The administration officials testified in support of the bill to extend for 3 years the President's authority to modify tariff duties by negotiating and proclaiming trade treaties with other countries.

There is a subhead entitled "Quizzed by Vandenberg." The able Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] is now in the Chamber, listening very attentively to what I have to say.

Mr. VANDENBERG. As usual.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Continuing with the article:

Senator ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG (R.), of Michigan, and Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE (P.), of Wisconsin, took the lead in questioning Wallace and Grady about the impact of British and French discriminations against American wheat, tobacco, apples, and other agricultural products on the so-called reciprocal-trade program.

The emphasis on the word "discriminations" is mine, and not that of the article.

Of course, the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] is interested in that statement, because his constituents are engaged in the production of apples as well as Virginia tobacco.

The British and French, taking refuge under the administration's cash-and-carry neutrality law, contend that their financial resources are required for the purchase of American munitions and that agricultural products must be obtained elsewhere.

In other words, the British have conserved their cash and their gold for a number of years, in view of the fact that they felt that the war now raging must eventually break out; and all the money they have they are spending in buying implements of death and munitions of war in the United States. As a result, all their cash is going to the arsenals of America, to the very great disadvantage and detriment of the farmers of Kentucky, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia.

Pursuing the clipping from the Times-Herald, another subhead is "Push Policy of Survival"—

When Senator LA FOLLETTE explained that American agriculture is affected by trade devices and practices other than tariffs and demanded to know whether "we have to sit back and take it," Wallace replied:

"Obviously you are referring to Great Britain and France. Their resources are somewhat limited and they are going to pursue a policy that will enable them to survive."

Senator LA FOLLETTE asked whether the Department of Agriculture had considered the desire of the warring nations for arms as a weapon to force them to purchase American agricultural products. He asked specifically whether the Department had considered the possibility of imposing an excise tax on munitions as an aid to the farmer. Wallace said this proposal had been suggested in an offhand manner, but that nothing had been done about it.

CITES "ADEQUATE POWER"

"Aren't we in a position to do something about the situation if we have the guts to do it?" LA FOLLETTE persisted.

"I think the Government has within the executive branch adequate power and adequate methods to meet the impact of the totalitarian economic policies of the nations at war, but I wouldn't care to state them for the record," Wallace replied.

(Later Grady also hinted that some kind of action looking toward the protection of the American farmer's markets was under consideration, but he, too, said he would not like to discuss it publicly.)

I cannot understand why the Secretary of Agriculture and the Assistant Secretary of State refuse to discuss the question publicly before a committee of Congress and give publicity to their reactions, or what they have to keep secret from the American people. At this time, when agriculture is suffering, and as a result labor is suffering, I think that our Cabinet members and other representatives of the Government should be perfectly frank in telling the American people about those things which they think ought to be kept secret. Surely nothing should be kept secret about matters pertaining to the farmers in Kentucky, Georgia, South Carolina, Virginia, North Carolina, and other States who are engaged in the production of apples, cotton, and tobacco. I think Mr. Henry Wallace, Secretary of Agriculture, should tell us what it is that is so secret about these matters, in which the American people are so vitally interested.

By the way, while I have the opportunity, I wish to state that the situation now confronting us as the result of Great Britain not buying tobacco, cotton, and apples in this country—and particularly tobacco and cotton—is not temporary. I think it is permanent, and of vital interest to American farmers who are producing cotton and tobacco. I think it is a matter which should have the attention and study of the Members of the Congress. I shall give my reasons. I should like to have further information, which I am seeking, in regard to the things which I shall bring to the attention of the Members of this body.

Great Britain said she had to stop buying tobacco from Virginia, South Carolina, North Carolina, and Georgia because she had to favor her allies. She had to favor the Turks, who killed hundreds of thousands of her men during the last World War. Turkey is an ally of hers now, and Great Britain said that she had to favor her friends. Consequently she could not continue to favor the Commonwealths which I mentioned a moment ago. She said not only was she going to favor her Turkish friends and allies, but she intimated that she was going to stick by and favor her Turkish friends and allies in the future, explaining that she was going to the expense and trouble of familiarizing her people with Turkish blends, which means that she was going to spend money and time in teaching the millions under her domination to smoke Turkish-blended cigarettes.

She further stated that she was going to encourage the production of tobacco not only in Turkey and all Asia Minor, but in portions of Africa and portions of Australia that can produce tobacco, all of which means that Great Britain is preparing herself to become self-sufficient in regard to tobacco and that we are not only losing a market which heretofore has been made great by the purchase by the British of our tobacco but that she is getting ready to be able from her colonies and protectorates to provide herself with tobacco that formerly she bought in the United States. So, as a result of this war, Great Britain is going to profit greatly, not only now but in the future, at the expense of producers of tobacco in Virginia, South Carolina, North Carolina, Georgia, and other States of the Union.

In addition to that, in reference to Great Britain becoming self-sufficient, she is not buying the cotton from us that she should. As a matter of fact, there is almost as much of an embargo upon cotton today as there is upon tobacco. We executed some sort of barter or trade agreement with her many months ago whereby she was to provide us with tin and rubber from the Malay States out of the Port of Singapore, and we were to give her in exchange, I think it was, 500,000 bales of cotton. I inquire of the Senator from Georgia if that is correct?

Mr. RUSSELL. The quantity was 600,000 bales.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Yes, 600,000 bales of cotton. On inquiry upon the floor of the Chamber the other day, I learned from the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] that to date Great Britain has ordered about 350,000 bales, but there is no evidence before this body that any of it has been shipped over there, and if it has actually been shipped there, and delivered physically, I should like to know it. I should like to know it for the benefit of numbers of my constituents who have written me inquiring what they might expect as the price for cotton this year and next year, and what they might expect of Great Britain. Great Britain is not taking any cotton now and has stated that she proposes to encourage more than ever before the production of the long-staple cotton in Egypt; she has stated that she proposes to encourage more than ever the production of cotton in India and in many sections of Africa where the production of cotton has increased phenomenally during the past several years.

Naturally we are interested, because cotton today is bringing only about 8 cents a pound; we have millions of bales of it in storage in Federal warehouses upon which we are paying rental to the warehouses. We should be more interested than ever in the future of our cotton farmers in Georgia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Virginia, and other States, because Great Britain, our friend across the sea, is getting ready to make herself self-sufficient from the standpoint of the production of cotton by way of encouraging a greater production of cotton in Egypt and various sections of Africa and in India.

I see the able junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HILL] listening very attentively. I am grateful for his attention, because I know how thoroughly interested he is in behalf of the farmers in Alabama.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I yield.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. I am very much interested in what the Senator is saying, and I do not wish to divert him from his discussion, but it brings to my mind the fact that in the Far East the Japanese have openly announced their intention, if they succeed in their campaign in China, of converting great acreages in China to the raising of cotton and to make use of the very cheap labor in China for that purpose. They have laid all the ground work for such a program.

Mr. REYNOLDS. That is true.

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. And we may look forward to the day, if the Japanese win the war, when the present great market for our cotton in Japan will be completely destroyed. Yet from day to day and week to week we are furnishing to Japan about 75 percent of the necessary war materials which she is using for the purpose of conquering China, although we know that her conquest of China, if attained, will be a very definite and direct blow to the cotton producers of the United States.

Mr. REYNOLDS. I thank the Senator very much, because his statement provides me with an opportunity of discussing the cotton situation in the Far East. I wanted to bring this matter to the attention of the Members of this body today because recently I have had so many letters from cotton farmers of North Carolina stating that at 8 cents a pound they cannot pay for fertilizer and their taxes, that they are actually losing money on the crop, and they want to know what I am going to do about it. All I can do about it is to bring the matter to the attention of the Members of this body, for I am not a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

We cannot blame Great Britain. I admire the British for endeavoring to become self-sufficient from the standpoint of being able in the future to provide themselves, out of their own territories and from the territories protected by them, with cotton and tobacco, but those two being our billion-dollar crops in this country, we are vitally interested in that situation. If they continue to encourage the production of cotton and the production of tobacco elsewhere, if they really intend to become self-sufficient in the case of these two commodities, then the cotton growers and tobacco farmers in this country had just as well make up their minds to go into some other line of agricultural production if they are to survive. As a matter of fact, to a large extent, the same situation will confront the States in the great West which are engaged in the production of wheat and in the production of wool.

We know that Great Britain—and rightly she should because she has to conserve her gold to comply with the cash-and-carry features of our neutrality law—is going to buy all the wheat she can from Canada and from Australia; and she is getting now all the wool she can, not from this country, as she formerly did, but from the great sheep-raising countries of Australia, Tasmania, and New Zealand. We must look to the future.

It strikes me that the producer of cotton is the man who will be harder hit than any of our other agriculturists, because he will have to contend not only with the action of Great Britain and European countries so far as the purchase of American cotton is concerned but he will have to face the oriental situation, as so forcefully presented a moment ago by the able Senator from the State of Washington [Mr. SCHWELLENBACH]. What is it? Japan today, of course, is buying more cotton from us than is any other nation on earth. She is buying millions of dollars' worth of cotton and taking it from our shores to Tokyo, and Kobe, and a half dozen of the other largest cities in Japan, which are engaged primarily in the production of textiles. She is employing cheap labor in the manufacture of textiles and sending the textiles back to this country to compete with our textile plants.

We in the cotton-producing sections of the South are largely dependent upon Japan; Japan has been our best customer for cotton; but I warn the cotton producers of the United States that they cannot, in the very near future, look longer to Japan buying our cotton. Why? Because portions of the territory in China which have already been conquered by Japan since the Japanese began their conquest several years ago—and that was 4 years after the conquest of Manchuria—are the very sections where atmospheric conditions are such as to produce a useful grade of cotton. The Japanese made conquest first of that line of territory extending from Shanghai along the shore all the way to the island of Hong Kong, upon which the city of Victoria sits. That is a cotton-producing region.

In addition to that, as we all know, cotton is produced in portions of Manchuria. Japan likewise is making ready, if possible, to become self-sufficient from the standpoint of the production of cotton; and if and when she succeeds in doing that the probabilities are that it will materially affect the market of our cotton producers in the South.

Furthermore, for some time Japan has not only been making purchases of cotton from Brazil, but she has been encouraging the production of cotton in Brazil. In connection with Japan's encouragement of the production of cotton in Brazil, I may remark in passing that prior to the time Mussolini went into Ethiopia the Japanese were engaged in the production of cotton, and the production of the poppy, from which opium is extracted, in Ethiopia, financed by Japanese financiers; but the Japanese now are not only buying cotton from Brazil but they are encouraging the production of cotton in that country.

I can give one example. On a big plantation down there there are concentrated in one plantation camp more than 3,000 Japanese engaged in the production of cotton. So when we who are interested in the cotton producers of the South realize that Great Britain is getting ready to become self-sufficient insofar as tobacco and cotton are concerned, and when we take into consideration the fact that Japan, which has been a great market for the cotton producers of the South, is entering into the picture, it is obvious that the cotton producers of the South have something of a problem confronting them in the future.

What Secretary Wallace had in mind relating to agriculture that he could not reveal, I do not know. It may be something that he should not reveal; but the public now are so greatly interested in anything that will bring about the reemployment of our people that they are beginning to feel that there should not be so much secrecy about this or that, and that all matters pertaining to the welfare and prosperity of the American people should be brought out.

Mr. President, the question of agriculture is related to the question of unemployment. I occasionally read Capt. Joe Patterson's newspaper, the New York Daily News, which has the largest circulation of any newspaper in the world. The other night I clipped from the February 27, 1940, issue of that newspaper an article headed—

TEN THOUSAND STORM NEWARK FIELD FOR 1,500 JOBS

More than 10,000 men and women swarmed around the $2,500,000 city hangar at Newark Airport yesterday morning in quest of jobs with the Brewster Aeronautical Co. The company had announced it would hire 1,500 workers after leasing the new hangar. The first job seekers arrived at 1:45 a. m.

More than 100 police, including 4 radio cars and a motorcycle squad, were required to handle the crowd, and traffic moved at a crawling pace, owing to several thousand private cars being parked on routes 1 and 25, which converge at the airport.

RUN OUT OF BLANKS

There were no arrests or disorder, but police were kept busy directing the job applicants to extinguish bonfires they built on the field to keep warm in the chilly wind.

Five members of the Brewster personnel department were flabbergasted when they saw the crowd waiting for them upon their arrival at 8 a. m. They immediately started handing out application blanks, but ran out of them in an hour, adding to the confusion.

In giving out the blanks, they explained that very few workers would be hired at first, but that the force would be increased as fast as the company could broaden its facilities.

A few people were to be engaged by that aeronautical company for the purpose of operating the airport at Newark. It is appalling to me to find that more than 10,000 men and women assembled with the break of day, when dawn was just approaching, in search of a few jobs that were offered at that airport.

With the agricultural situation taking the turn that it is taking in this country, when we of North Carolina cannot sell our cotton or our tobacco, and the same thing applies to other States engaged in the production of those commodities, and when millions are out of employment, the situation is becoming very acute and very serious. Therefore I think we ought to pay much more attention to our domestic matters, to what is taking place in this country today, and forget about what is taking place over yonder until we can provide employment for the unfortunates of our country, after which we can perhaps go over there and clean house with them.

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I shall be delighted to yield to the Senator.

Mr. LUNDEEN. The able Senator made a statement concerning the unemployed of New York City, I believe.

Mr. REYNOLDS. No; this incident was in Newark, N. J.

Mr. LUNDEEN. That would be a good time to loan some more money to foreign nations, would it not, so our European-minded people would say?

Mr. REYNOLDS. By the way, in that connection I happened to notice in this morning's newspaper that Representative FISH, of New York, or somebody else, had suggested that we make an outright donation of $20,000,000 without any strings tied to it. I am not in favor of that. We have too many hungry people in this country, too many people who are living in squalor, who have not a roof over their heads; too many people who are naked and cold. If we had $20,000,000 to give away, I want to give that $20,000,000 to the American people.

Mr. LUNDEEN. I wish to say to the Senator that I agree with his able statement. It seems to me we are going pretty far when we are embarking upon further loans to European nations in the face of calamities and tragic unemployment told here today. Why not turn to our domestic affairs and forget this world-saving business, in which for more than 20 years we have been so unsuccessfully engaged?

Mr. REYNOLDS. I thank the Senator. So far as I am concerned, I want to save the people of the United States before; by my vote in this body, I attempt to save the people of the world. I think, if the Senator will pardon me, that the time has arrived when we should give a little bit of thought to the people here at home.

Mr. LUNDEEN. O Mr. President, that would never do. We must save the British Empire, and the French, and various other countries in Europe, Asia, and Africa. We must save them first. It would never do to think of America first. That would never do. We must turn our attention to Europe; we must extend loans to European nations; we must finance them; we must arm them; and we must forget America. That is the doctrine preached from the housetops, from a thousand lecture platforms, by the swarming lecturers and propagandists who are infesting America today. I am in favor of more appropriations—appropriations to pay the cost of deporting all these aliens and paid agents whose traitorous doctrines threaten the very foundations of our Government.

Mr. REYNOLDS. That is true. Of course, we want to see England and France and all the other nations of the world saved and spared; but, so far as I am concerned, I will say to the Senator that I do not want to save England or France or any other country in the world at the expense of the blood of the sons of American mothers. That is my position.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 29, 1940

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we praise Thee for Him whose name is the Prince of Peace; how manifold are the images of Him. The child still stands in open-eyed wonder before Him as He puts strange questions to the temple sages; to the laborer He is still the carpenter toiling in the Nazareth workshop; to the tempted He is still meeting the test in the wilderness and vanishing the tempter by His unshaken faith; to the weary He is still resting by the wayside well; to the bereaved He is still weeping beside the mourners at the tomb. Oh, we thank Thee that we have seen Thy glory in the face of Jesus. Heavenly Father, in His holy name let there come forth a new knighthood that will fling down the challenge before racial and creedal hate, malice, and the strongholds of sin. Do Thou guide the world, for it is blind; deliver it, for it is in bondage; and save it ere it is lost. In the name of our Redeemer. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

[Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix of the RECORD.]

HON. BARTEL J. JONKMAN

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House:

FEBRUARY 29, 1940.

The SPEAKER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The certificate of election, in due form of law, of Hon. BARTEL J. JONKMAN as a Representative-elect to the Seventy-sixth Congress, from the Fifth Congressional District of Michigan, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Hon. Carl E. Mapes, is on file in this office.

Very truly yours,

SOUTH TRIMBLE,
Clerk of the House of Representatives.
By H. NEWLIN MERILL.

SWEARING IN OF MEMBER

Mr. BARTEL J. JONKMAN appeared at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD at this point and to include therein a letter I have written.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I have sent a letter to Members of the House of Representatives asking them to sign discharge petition No. 4. This is the discharge petition on my resolution which proposes a constitutional referendum on participation in overseas wars. The principle embodied in this resolution is dear to the hearts of the American people and now, when the United States is at peace with the whole world, would seem to be a proper time to bring this much-discussed resolution out of committee, debate it thoroughly, and then vote on it. It is certain that a proposal which is so meritorious and has so much sentiment back of it will never be finally disposed of in any other way. I do hope that in this time of peaceful relations with the world Members will give consideration to this vital question of domestic policy and by taking counsel of their sense of fair play will sign the discharge petition so as to give this resolution its day in the House. That is all that is asked, and it seems to me that it is a very reasonable request.

By unanimous consent of the House, I present herewith for publication in the RECORD the letter I have written to the Members of this body, as follows:

FEBRUARY 26, 1940.

DEAR COLLEAGUE AND FRIEND: I hope you can see your way clear to sign discharge petition No. 4, now at the Speaker's desk. This is the petition that is intended to bring before the House for debate and a vote the resolution I have introduced for a constitutional amendment to give the people a right to vote on participation in foreign wars overseas. This proposed constitutional amendment would not interfere in any way or in any degree with our national defense. In case of attack or invasion of the United States or any country in the Western Hemisphere, the referendum would not apply.

I believe that strong national defense, coupled with a referendum on nondefensive or overseas wars, would be the best peace insurance this country could possibly have.

Five Gallup polls have agreed in their findings that a majority of the American people favor this constitutional amendment. Even though you may not now approve the resolution, please sign the petition to give it its day in the House. It is good Americanism, as well as good sportsmanship, to allow a proposal in which so many millions are interested to be debated and then voted up or down as two-thirds of the House may decide. I do not ask you to vote for the measure, but only that you help to get it before the House for consideration in the good American way. I believe that is a reasonable request.

Will you not help by signing discharge petition No. 4?

Yours sincerely,

LOUIS LUDLOW.

AMERICAN NEUTRALITY

Mr. JACOBSEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. JACOBSEN. Mr. Speaker, destructive wars and conflicts now raging in Europe present to our own country difficult, complex, and disturbing problems of statecraft whose solution tries to the utmost the talents of our ablest leaders. Our President and the Department of State have met these courageously. They have emphasized more than frequently the neutral attitude of the United States toward the nations involved. They have made clear and reiterated many times the simple and obvious fact that we are at peace with every people. They have stressed our rights as neutrals and have vigorously protested the invasion of those rights by belligerents.

With every confidence in the ability of our administration to cope successfully with intricate international developments and to prevent our involvement in these foreign embroilments; nevertheless, I, as a Member of this body, feel it my duty to be anxiously concerned with the acts of belligerents affecting our neutrality.

In particular do I protest and remonstrate against the high-handed conduct of England in her interference with American shipping upon the seas. Without apparent justification, she has wantonly arrogated to herself the unwarranted prerogative of seizing upon our mails, delaying our ships, and causing loss and injury to our commerce. History amply demonstrates that, while the immediate ill effects of such acts may be counteracted, the ultimate results of them may lead to serious and unavoidable consequences. Let no act of any belligerent go unchallenged when that act interferes with our rights as a peace-loving and neutral nation. Yet, let our conduct of international relations be such that no nation can seize upon our line of action as an excuse to involve us in the present European conflict. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. LEAVY asked and was given permission to revise and extend his own remarks.

Mr. SCHWERT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a statement made by Dr. Francis E. Fronczak, health commissioner of the city of Buffalo, N. Y.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

THE NEW ELECTRIC METER

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, in my efforts to improve the conditions of the farmers of this country, one of my chief battles has been that of getting electricity to the farmers' homes, getting it to them at rates they could afford to pay, and at the same time making it possible for them to secure the necessary electrical appliances at reasonable prices.

One thing that has disturbed me most has been the fact that we were using an electric meter in this country that was not only obsolete, but that was so complicated that the average farmer could not read it, and so expensive that he could not afford to buy it. It has four dials on it, with the hands on two of the dials turning clockwise and the hands on the other two turning anticlockwise.

I have one of those old meters here now, and I dare say there are not a dozen Members of the House who can walk up here and take a look at it and read it, offhand. I saw one very distinguished Republican Congressman, who has had a good deal to say about my attitude on the power question, make the attempt a while ago, and fail. If he cannot read it, how in the world can he expect the farmers in his district to read it, and especially the women and children on the farm?

I learned several years ago that they were manufacturing meters in Canada with only one dial, that any schoolboy could read, and that could be sold for something like half the price of these old cumbersome four-dial meters. I set in to try to get them put on the market in this country, and especially in those areas where we are building rural power lines, but I was informed that the manufacturers, for several reasons, said they could not make them.

I sent them word that if they could not make them, we could get a reciprocal-trade agreement through with Canada and get these meters imported from Ontario. That brought results; I was immediately notified that the manufacturers in this country were ready to make these meters for the R. E. A. to be supplied to the farmers on the R. E. A. lines.

I have one of these meters here now. Instead of having four dials, two running clockwise and two running anticlockwise, it has only one dial or one straight row of figures, just like the meter which registers the number of miles traveled on an automobile. Where the old meter costs $12.50, this new one costs only $8; that is, the large one.

I also have here a small meter for use in farm homes that retails for $5, and answers every purpose. Instead of having four dials, it simply has a straight row of figures, like a recording speedometer on an automobile.

In case the light goes out in the house, there is a little button on the side of this meter which when pressed turns on a small light inside of it. This indicates that the trouble is in the house and not out on the line, and that all that is necessary to do is to change the fuse. If this little light fails to come on when the button is pressed, that indicates that the trouble is out on the line.

This new meter, which, as I said, only has one dial, or one straight line of figures, can be read by any schoolboy. This not only enables the farmers to read their own meters but it saves the expenses of sending a man around to read them every month. All that is necessary is to send the farmer a postal card and ask him to read the meter and put the figures on the card and return it to headquarters. Then the meter reader can go around once every 6 months, or once every year, and check up on it.

This may not seem to be a very great saving, but when you realize that there are 23,000,000 domestic consumers of electricity in this country, you can see that if each one of them had to have a new meter, the saving would run well above $100,000,000 for the whole country.

If we can bring the price of water pumps, refrigerators, washing machines, electric irons, and other electrical appliances down in proportion, there is no telling what the saving will mean to the American people, and especially to the American farmers.

I am placing these meters on display out in the hall, and I hope every Member will take the trouble to examine them. This change has not only simplified electric meters to the point where everyone can read and understand them without the assistance of an engineer, but, as I said, it has reduced the cost to the point where the farmers can afford to buy them. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOLLES]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a resolution adopted by the executive council of the Wisconsin Conservation Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOLLES]?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. VAN ZANDT]?

There was no objection.

[Mr. VAN ZANDT addressed the House. His remarks appear in the Appendix of the RECORD.]

THE PROBLEM CONFRONTING CONGRESS

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RICH]?

There was no objection.

Mr. RICH. Mr. Speaker, the No. 1 job for Congress is to try to find positions and jobs for the 9,000,000 American people who are out of work. The same number of people have been out of work for 10 years. What are we doing toward creating jobs for these people? As the gentleman who addressed you a minute ago said, practically everything we do results in putting men out of work instead of giving men jobs and the opportunity to earn money. You make laws that put men out of jobs rather than make laws to create jobs. After 7 years you certainly should see that that is the case.

We have in our Labor Department Miss Perkins, who is doing nothing in the way of getting the country on its feet; more strikes and more unemployment than was even known in our country under her administration. Then we have the gentlewoman from New Jersey [Mrs. NORTON], chairman of the Committee on Labor of the House, sitting down on the job and not permitting legislation to be considered by this House so far as the N. L. R. B. is concerned. She will not legislate to give labor jobs or else she does not know how. We are having hearings about Wagner Act and N. L. R. B. by the Smith committee, but I am afraid the hearings will be prolonged to such an extent that we will not have the opportunity to change the law at this session. This law is doing more to keep $6,000,000,000 in the banks of this country than anything else because the owners of that money are afraid to spend it in business. Why do we not do something? Congress, or I may say the leaders, the President, the Speaker, the majority leader, the Democratic Party—heads of Government—will not change the bad laws they have passed, they will not restore confidence in business, they seem to be asleep for some reason or other. Why? Who controls them? After 7 years of trying to put 9,000,000 people to work has accomplished nothing in that respect. That is to admit failure. This administration has put a debt of twenty-four billions on future generations, and I am fearful it will wreck our children, if not ourselves and our Nation.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point a letter from the Director of the Bureau of the Census, which I received this morning.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SNYDER]?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF THE CENSUS,
Washington, February 26, 1940.

Hon. J. BUELL SNYDER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SNYDER: Many false statements and inferences are being circulated concerning the decennial census. For your information there is enclosed a letter which I sent to the New York Times in answer to the more serious misstatements. I have marked certain paragraphs, for your special attention, giving the facts on the following salient points:

1. No Federal official can reveal any census information pertaining to any individual.

2. Business organizations and many other groups outside the Government requested inclusion of the income question.

3. The income inquiry does not call for total income. The extent of the question contemplated is absolutely necessary to get a proper measure of unemployment, and Congress itself recognized this necessity by directly calling for income in the 1937 unemployment census. A measure of purchasing power is essential to business for the development of broader markets for its products. For 20 years one of the most vital parts of the census of agriculture has been the question on income of farms.

4. The demand for the housing census came from business organizations outside the Government for facts which would stimulate home construction. Several of the important organizations demanding these facts are listed.

I hope that the enclosed statement will be of assistance to you in answering correctly any inquiries which you may receive from your constituents and in the consideration of census matters.

Very truly yours,

W. L. AUSTIN, Director.

STRAW BALLOTS

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE]?

There was no objection.

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, yesterday I appeared before the Rules Committee of this House asking for consideration of House Concurrent Resolution 30, which I introduced in the hope that the Congress would make it its business to learn something about the way in which the much-publicized polls are conducted. These polls, which purpose to sample public opinion on issues and candidates, are publicized in newspapers throughout the Nation and widely quoted by the readers of the papers, who have no knowledge whatever of the way in which public opinion is sampled nor of the statistical methods used in formulating the statements which reach the press and the public.

Since most of the polls are now concerned with candidates for the Presidency and with legislative matters before the Congress, both parties are actually deeply concerned with the conduct of the polls. It is to the interest of every citizen and very specifically the business of Members of this Congress to know whether the polls are reliable, whether they actually sample public opinion, or whether the questions are so formulated that they are designed very subtlely to mold public opinion. Some people in responsible positions actually seem to have a superstitious regard for the sanctity of these polls. When those who conduct them are also concerned with national advertising, the question becomes more involved and the necessity for investigation more urgent. House Concurrent Resolution 30 has resulted from a series of resolutions and bills which I have persistently introduced, hoping that the Congress would enter this interesting field and perform its obvious duty in connection with ascertaining the facts upon the relation of the polls to public questions and public matters. I shall presently set before my colleagues a thorough discussion of straw ballots, but I desire at this time to offer a brief statement in order to call attention to the resolution and to initiate the discussion of this important subject. We shall later be concerned with the framing of the questions, the selection of the people polled, and the methods of interpreting the results.

For several years I have made a study of so-called straw ballots, or the measuring of public opinion by taking polls. After very careful study and thought, I have come to the conclusion that polls are often wrong in theory, in practice, and in fact, and that when interpreted an entirely erroneous conclusion may be drawn. The taking of polls and securing the wide use of the results of polls through syndicated columns in newspapers has become a feature of our elections and legislation which can no longer be ignored by legislative bodies nor by candidates. The matter appears to be wholly commercial. I think it is not scientific, and never can be scientific. It appears to me to be a very successful attempt to make public opinion, rather than a method of measuring public opinion.

Some Members of Congress have obviously been influenced by these polls, as they are quoted when critical and close votes are being taken. It certainly behooves the Congress to learn how the polls are taken, whether they do cover enough territory to give any adequate indication of public opinion, and whether they are ever manipulated in favor of certain candidates or in favor of certain legislation. It is my understanding that Dr. Gallup, and probably others who have made a business of polls, would welcome an opportunity to tell a congressional committee just how they conduct the polls. It is my opinion that there should be annual investigation, possibly by the committees of Congress in connection with the investigation of corrupt practices at elections.

As you will recall, the outstanding measurers of public opinion are Dr. Gallup and Messrs. Cherrington, Roper, Crosley, and Houser. The outstanding periodical publication which seems to take the lead in offering the results of polls is Fortune magazine. When a great advertising firm which handles national advertising and does business with local papers everywhere syndicates a column on polls, that column is likely to be widely used. Even without wrong intent, the trend is obvious.

When I became a Member of the Congress in March 1933, I early introduced a bill for the purpose of forbidding the use of the mails by those taking polls of public opinion. The bill was aimed directly at the Literary Digest poll. My bill was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and they had hearings. I failed to receive a favorable report from the Post Office Department. The Postmaster General claimed that he did not feel he was warranted in losing the revenue derived from taking polls by mail, estimated at $2,000,000 during a Presidential election. Finally the committee saw fit not to report the bill out, though some members were clearly impressed and really desired the passage. After the blow-up of the Literary Digest in the election of 1936, in which the prediction proved so far from the truth that it ruined the publication, I introduced a resolution calling for an investigation so that the people might be fully informed as to the method of securing the poll, and the so-called measuring of public opinion.

It is my desire now, and is the purpose of the pending resolution, to have the Speaker of the House and the President of the Senate appoint five Members from each body to constitute a committee of 10 to hold hearings and ascertain how the polls are made, so the public and the Congress may be fully informed. It is not intended that this will be an extensive hearing, it can probably be concluded within a few weeks; there need be sittings of the committee in Washington only. Those who are actively engaged in making and issuing polls should be summoned to the National Capital to describe their methods in detail, including men heretofore mentioned, together with a representative from the magazine Fortune, which is making quite a leader of its measuring of public opinion.

Dr. Gallup sells his poll to many widely read papers. It reaches Congress arranged in interesting form. Persons glancing at the paper find it conspicuously displayed, often on the front page, with percentages set forth in bold type. My contention is that the poll is, or may be, propaganda. I do not believe that a scientific poll can be taken of the city of Washington, or any other city, based upon questions on which very few people are sufficiently informed to entitle them to an opinion. The taking of a candidate's poll is extremely dangerous to the candidate for office who has not plenty of money to watch all the polls, and, if you please, "stuff the ballot box."

In the old days of the Literary Digest, the ballots were sent out to a certain number of people whose names were found in telephone books, and taken from various lists of voters and citizens. Selection was not made at random, there was powerful official cooperation and the whole thing was entirely objectionable from every standpoint. Dr. Gallup is said to have scientifically trained interpreters and agents stationed over the United States to go out, when called upon by the doctor, and inquire, in a certain very clever way, of the persons interviewed what is their opinion upon a certain question, very cleverly stated by those who are past masters of the business of framing questions, in a manner calculated to evoke certain replies. Then a report is made to the doctor's headquarters, and, using his methodical table as to the number of interviews and the number of people, he arrives at his percentage, which may not be properly designated as scientific, and is apt to be misleading and dangerous because so plausible and interesting. It might easily be manipulated by those having ample money and influence, coupled with the desire to mold opinion on some particular matter, not necessarily with evil intent, but most certainly as propaganda.

It is estimated that fully one-fifth of all the voters who vote at elections vote for the one they believe will be the winner. The question that is uppermost in mind, when the voter goes into the booth, is "How can I get on the bandwagon? Who is going to win?" Perhaps, with their morning breakfast they have had the news flashed at them that a poll taken has resulted one way or another, and shows the drift to be a certain way. The natural tendency is to go that way.

I remember one case in the State of Oregon in 1916 when Wilson was candidate for reelection. A strong campaign had been made in his behalf. In the city of Portland and all the large centers, workers for Wilson's reelection were confidently expecting a victory for their candidate. At 2 o'clock the Oregon Journal, a Democratic paper supporting Wilson, announced that New York and all the Atlantic seaboard north had voted for Hughes, and that Hughes was unquestionably elected President. Democratic voters, glancing at the headlines, said, "What the hell is the use?" Many neglected to go to the polls, believing they were defeated. The Republican workers for Hughes redoubled their energies. Oregon carried for Hughes in that election by a very small vote—about 6,000, if I remember correctly. It has been freely stated by those who ought to know something about it that had it not been for the unfortunate announcement of the chief paper supporting Wilson in that campaign, he would have carried the State.

I have found in my long political career that the strongest argument I can make in my behalf, that my friends can make in my behalf, is, "He's going to win. You might as well get on the bandwagon." It takes the starch out of the opponent; it puts backbone into the friends of the one who can create that sentiment.

Measuring public opinion can be so easily manipulated, if money is used at the right time and right place, that I feel that this Congress ought, by a congressional investigation, to investigate the methods and let the public know upon what foundation the measurers of public opinion are building.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. PIERCE]?

There was no objection.

UNITED STATES NAVY

Mr. SABATH, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged resolution, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed:

House Resolution 390

Resolved, That immediately upon adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of H. R. 8026, a bill to establish the composition of the United States Navy, to authorize the construction of certain naval vessels, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 3 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

ESTABLISHING A NATIONAL LAND POLICY

Mr. COLMER, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged resolution, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed:

House Resolution 406

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of H. R. 8157, a bill to establish a national land policy, and to provide homesteads free of debt for actual farm families. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 4 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Public Lands, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit with or without instructions.

COMMITTEE ON RULES

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY] stated that his resolution, House Resolution 360, is before the Committee on Rules. The gentleman from Oregon stated that he appeared before the Committee on Rules yesterday.

I wish to say it is impossible for the Rules Committee to schedule hearings on all resolutions referred to it. I suggest now for the information of the House that all Members who have introduced resolutions and desire hearings to make a formal written request for a hearing. Under the rules of the committee, a hearing cannot be scheduled until an application for same has been submitted. I also wish to suggest at this time that chairmen of the various committees who have reported their bills, and who believe that they are entitled to a rule, make application for hearings without delay.

The Rules Committee today reported 4 special rules; 3 rules were previously granted at this session upon which the House has not acted, and there are 5 rules granted during the first session carried over to this session which await the action of the House. This is a total of 12 pending rules subject to the consideration of the House, and it is my further suggestion to the chairmen of committees that they do not delay their hearings on bills or resolutions which they expect to report and on which they intend to ask for a rule. There are many pending applications for hearings, and I feel it is to the interest of committee chairmen to speed up action on their hearings, as the Rules Committee, in the effort to cooperate in bringing about an early adjournment, will be unable to take up and give consideration to last-minute requests for hearings for special rules. The Speaker and the majority leader, and, I believe, the membership as a whole, are working for an early adjournment. Consequently, the Rules Committee will not entertain late requests for the granting of rules on bills and resolutions the consideration of which by the House may tend to prevent an early adjournment.

[Here the gavel fell.]

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Obviously a quorum is not present.

GEORGE A. CARDEN AND ANDERSON T. HERD

Mr. CLARK, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged resolution, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed:

House Resolution 407

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of H. R. 7230, a bill to provide for an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States from the decision of the Court of Claims in a suit instituted by George A. Carden and Anderson T. Herd. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Judiciary, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

BUREAU OF LABOR STATISTICS

Mr. SABATH, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged resolution, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed:

House Resolution 408

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of House Joint Resolution 265, a joint resolution authorizing the Bureau of Labor Statistics to make studies of productivity and labor costs in industry. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 1 hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Labor, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit, with or without instructions.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. FLAHERTY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD and include therein an editorial from the Washington Post regarding the third-term resolution, which is most timely and forceful.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

WAR DEPARTMENT CIVIL FUNCTIONS APPROPRIATION BILL, 1941

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8668) making appropriations for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1941, for civil functions administered by the War Department, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8668, with Mr. BOEHNE in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. At the conclusion of the session yesterday the Clerk had reached the top of page 2. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read down to and including line 21 on page 3.

By unanimous consent, the word "enroach", in line 17, on page 3, was corrected to read "encroach."

The Clerk read as follows:

Power plant, Bonneville Dam, Columbia River, Oreg.: For continuing the construction of the hydroelectric power plant at Bonneville Dam, Columbia River, Oreg., as authorized by the acts approved August 30, 1935 (49 Stat. 1038), and August 20, 1937 (50 Stat. 731), $800,000, no part of which shall be available for obligation for any expense incident to the installation of more than six electrical power units.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

THE BONNEVILLE PROJECT IN OREGON AND WASHINGTON

Mr. Chairman, the river-development project at Bonneville, on the Columbia River between Oregon and Washington, is no longer in the experimental stage. It is now in operation and has proven itself to be feasible and, I am certain, is demonstrating that it will be a self-supporting venture and a profitable undertaking.

Work was begun on September 30, 1933, under the provisions of the National Industrial Recovery Act, the project being formally authorized in the Rivers and Harbors Act approved August 30, 1935. The project is located 40 miles east of Portland and includes a dam, powerhouse, ship lock, and fishways. The purpose of the project is for the improvement of the Columbia River for water transportation and utilization of hydroelectrical power made available by reason of this improvement.

The plans call for 10 units in the power project. Two of these are now completed and in operation under the direction of the Secretary of War and under the supervision of the Chief of Engineers of the United States Army.

Two additional units are under construction with appropriations heretofore made, and will be completed and ready for operation in March 1941. The capacity of the plant with the two units in operation is 86,400 kilowatts, which began operating to practically 90 percent of their full capacity in December of last year. The four units will furnish 194,400 kilowatts.

At the last session of Congress, when appropriations were under consideration for carrying on the work of this project, no transmission lines had been completed, so that it was impossible to market the electrical energy that was then available from the first two units. The transmission line between Bonneville and Portland was energized on December 1, 1939, and delivery of power began on that date to the Portland General Electric Co.

The line to Eugene is now completed, or practically so, and the remaining lines will be completed during the calendar year 1940.

Administrator Ross, who had charge of the marketing of power, died on March 14, 1939, and until September 16 his place had not been filled with a permanent administrator, which resulted in some delay in planning and carrying out a permanent program.

Mr. Chairman, contracts already entered into and now under negotiation will absorb the entire capacity of the first four units of the project. A contract has been made with the Aluminum Co. of America, calling for the delivery of 42,500 kilowatts of prime power at $17.50, and a contract is nearing completion with another manufacturing company which will take an additional allotment of prime power. These, together with the contracts made with public utilities districts and municipalities, as shown by the report of the Administrator, Dr. Raver, will afford a market for all of the power available, three-fourths of the existing plant capacity being already under contract.

In discussing this subject last year in the Congress, I called attention to the fact that steam-plant capacity in the Northwest area contiguous to Bonneville amounted to 370,000 kilowatts, or 71 percent of the ultimate capacity of Bonneville, and that by 1945 about 400,000 kilowatts of the then existing plant capacity would, because of age, be removed. During December of last year private utilities serving Portland used as high as 79,000 kilowatts, or 91 percent of the present capacity, which demonstrates that there is a market for this displacing power.

The annual report of the administrator of the Bonneville project shows that prime load immediately in sight through applications, contracts under negotiations, or contracts executed will total about 177,000 kilowatts in the fiscal year 1941, and 232,000 kilowatts in the fiscal year 1942. Present schedules for machine installation show that only 86,400 kilowatts will be available until the latter part of the fiscal year 1941. This available capacity will not be sufficient to meet actual demands under existing contracts and those in process of execution; in fact, will only be about one-half of the estimated requirement.

I have said that experience thus far with Bonneville shows that it will be a self-supporting project. The second annual report of the Administrator shows a total estimated revenue on the completion of the 10 units, and with the completion of the transmission lines as being $9,350,000 annually, with a net revenue of $7,459,549. Interest and amortization amounts to $4,060,000 per year, leaving a net above all charges of $3,399,549.

The transmission lines now having been in part completed and many trunk lines nearing completion necessitates additional funds for operation, which accounts for the increased budget submitted this year. Operation under Dr. Raver, administrator, is proceeding satisfactorily, and he is showing remarkable progress in securing of contracts not only with public utility district and municipalities but with private utilities and manufacturing enterprises, which will, I am sure, furnish a market for all of the available power which Bonneville will produce. Administrator Raver reports that the anticipated yearly revenues from the contract with the Portland General Electrical Co. alone is estimated to be in excess of $500,000, and he estimates the annual revenues from the contract with the Aluminum Co. and the other manufacturing company with whom the contract is now practically complete will exceed $500,000 yearly. These receipts from the Aluminum Co., however, will not commence before January 1, 1941. The administrator further states that, in his opinion, other contracts of a like character will be successfully negotiated.

As a result of the energizing of the transmission line to Portland, the city of Portland, on October 15, 1939, put into effect a rate reduction which Administrator Raver states is approximately 20 percent.

Mr. Chairman, should the Congress fail to make the appropriations requested in the Budget, this whole project will be delayed and the developments which are proceeding so satisfactorily will be stopped. Furthermore, much of the large investment which the Federal Government has in the project will be forced into idleness. Good common sense and good business judgment require, now that the project is nearing the stage of completion, that the necessary funds should be made available for its completion and successful operation.

The engineers advise that at the time the foundations are being constructed for units 5 and 6, the additional foundations for 7, 8, 9, and 10 should also be constructed. If this is not done, when construction takes place at some future date it will be necessary to close the operations of the generators 5 and 6 during this construction period. This would not only disrupt the service for a long period of time and deprive industries, municipalities, and farming communities of electrical energy but it would also deprive the Government of very large revenues during the inactive period of the dynamos, estimated to be $1,500,000 annually.

These foundations could be constructed as one project far cheaper than by constructing them piecemeal. In view of the fact that power applications clearly indicate all of the power available from the 10 generators will be needed by the time they complete construction, it is only good judgment to provide sufficient funds now to construct the foundations for the remaining units.

The whole Northwest territory contiguous to the Bonneville and Grand Coulee projects is a region of very great natural resources awaiting development. We have large areas of highly developed agricultural land, much of it under irrigation, and our great need is for markets. Much of the raw material, through manufacturing and processing, may be utilized and markets found for it through utilization of the electrical energy afforded by these two great Federal projects. Over 50 percent of the pay rolls of Oregon come from the forest industry. The major portion of forest products are sold in the raw state. Much of it, through manufacturing, could be utilized at the place of origin, thus not only affording a market for the production but also pay rolls, and thereby a market for much of our agricultural crops. In the Northwest States of Oregon, Washington, Idaho, and Montana there are immense deposits of strategic materials which our Government is in need of not only in wartimes but in peace as well. Included, among others, are manganese, mercury, chromite, aluminum ores, in addition to many others. The reduction of these ores and the utilization in manufactured products, or in processing requires large volumes of cheap electrical energy which can be furnished in the vicinity of these projects at the very lowest possible cost. The scientific developments which have been and are now taking place through the study of chemistry and the application of chemurgy to farm products will afford an outlet not only for the agricultural and other products of this region but also give a market for the power produced. Studies made by the Federal Power Commission indicate that the requirements of electrochemical and electrometallurgic industries have been increasing at a rate somewhat greater than that of general industrial activities, and the Commission estimates that these extraordinary requirements will be increased in 1940 by approximately 33 percent over 1936. These developments will call for large blocks of electrical energy.

Mr. Chairman, the Army engineers, whose judgment we have always found to be dependable and whose estimates are conservative, made an estimate of $7,089,200 as being necessary to continue the construction work on the Bonneville project. Units 1 and 2 of the hydroelectric plant only are completed; 3 and 4 will be completed this coming year, and 5 and 6 will follow in 1942. If only the $800,000 recommended in the Budget and the Appropriations Committee is allowed, it will slow this whole project.

The second annual report of the administrator shows definitely that power contracts already obtained and those in sight will afford a market for all of the power that will be produced from the additional turbines as fast as they can be installed, as it requires fully 2 years for construction and installation after an appropriation is made for additional units. The plants now owned and in operation by public utilities and municipal corporations are not of sufficient capacity to take care of the demands for electrical energy in the territory served by Bonneville. Bonneville will not displace existing plants but will market its power through existing facilities or municipalities or public districts. Unquestionably there will be a shortage of power facilities unless this project is allowed to continue normally to the full completion of the 10 power units. It is in the public interest and a matter of sound business judgment to provide the additional facilities by making sufficient appropriations for the installation of the additional units called for in the project plan so that full utilization may be made of the total investment for power facilities which the Government now has made in this great project, and I sincerely hope that this Congress in its wisdom will see its way clear to authorize the amount requested by the Army engineers for continuing the work on the Bonneville project.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total, Panama Canal, $30,098,771, to be available until expended.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, yesterday the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] stated in the RECORD that he intended to offer an amendment putting the item for the third set of locks for the Panama Canal back in this bill. If the gentleman is on the floor at the moment——

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POWERS. I yield.

Mr. BLAND. For reasons that appeal to me I have decided not to offer the amendment at this time.

Mr. POWERS. May I ask the gentleman whether he agrees with the committee that work on the extra set of locks should not start at this time?

Mr. BLAND. I do not.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, then, as a matter of record, it seems to me if the gentleman from Virginia has changed his mind that there must be some motive behind the quick change. It appears to me that probably the new strategy is to have this amendment put on in another body and then when the bill goes to conference for pressure to be put on the conferees on the part of the House to agree to the new set of locks. If that is the strategy and if that is the plan, Mr. Chairman, I would like to state emphatically that every member of the subcommittee on War Department appropriations is unalterably opposed to the construction of a third set of locks in Panama at this time.

I am sorry I did not know that the gentleman would not offer his amendment for I would have had an amendment prepared and offered by someone to put the House on record against a third set of locks at this time.

Mr. Chairman, our testimony clearly and distinctly shows that in the opinion of General Strong, in the opinion of Governor Ridley, a third set of locks would be necessary from a national defense standpoint at the beginning of hostilities or in times of strained international relations. Now, certainly we are in somewhat that position at this moment. If such is the case why proceed with a third set of locks which will take 6 years to build and will cost $277,000,000?

Mr. Chairman, there is absolutely no necessity for the beginning of this expenditure in any appreciable amount at the present time. We are providing in this bill approximately $25,000,000 for protective measures in the Canal Zone. We will have provided by the end of next year a total of probably $39,000,000. The present locks will be bombproof. The plan is to build the new locks within a quarter of a mile to a half mile of the present ones. They are supposed to be bombproof, too. If we are spending $39,000,000 for protective devices in the Canal Zone and spending that money partially to bombproof the present locks, there is no reason in the world, in my opinion, or in the opinion of the committee, to build the third set of locks a quarter of a mile or a half a mile away, particularly in view of the present efficacy of the modern airplanes. Certainly, it does not take a modern plane more than a few seconds to go a quarter of a mile or half a mile.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

Mr. POWERS. Certainly, it takes a modern plane but a few seconds to go a quarter of a mile or half a mile and if our two sets of locks down there can be put out of commission by bombing, certainly another set, a quarter of a mile or a half mile distant, can be put out of commission.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] spoke yesterday about sabotage. Certainly, there are chances of sabotage in the Canal Zone. I admit that, and everyone else admits that, but certainly the gentleman from Virginia knows of the technical devices which are already installed in the Canal Zone and which I would hesitate to state for the RECORD. The gentleman knows of those protective devices and he knows that now the only way there could be any sabotage would be for a ship to go into the canal itself and blow itself up; in other words, to go in on a suicidal mission, and that is highly problematical, due to the fact there is a very rigid inspection of all cargoes and all ships on both sides of the canal.

Mr. Chairman, I merely take this time to state emphatically that if this amendment is placed on the bill in another body, I am confident this subcommittee will absolutely oppose it. I believe it to be the consensus of the entire House that the work should not be proceeded with at this time.

In closing, let me call the attention of the membership to this fact. The War Department appropriation bills of this year, military and nonmilitary, will amount to more than our national debt in 1917, or at the beginning of the World War. It is time to call a halt on some of these so-called defense measures. [Applause.]

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] and his committee are proud of the work done by them in getting legislation through the Congress in providing for the construction of an auxiliary waterway in the Panama Canal Zone. It is quite essential for the Committee on Appropriations to function efficiently, that there be legislatively approved programs for its guidance. I submit, however, it is the prerogative of the committee to consider and recommend the amount of the appropriation which should be provided for the prosecution of such programs. That is all we have done in this instance. It is for the House to determine whether or not it wishes to go along with our recommendation.

I have read the gentleman's statement which he put in yesterday's RECORD. I see nothing in it that the committee was not informed about when it considered this appropriation. I am sure we have a full comprehension of what is involved; I may say, possibly a fuller comprehension than my esteemed colleague, because of our more intimate contact with purely defense problems.

There is no question that this additional waterway ultimately will be built. All studies point to its need for commercial purposes by 1960 or a few years later.

Neither is there any question about its contribution to the effectiveness of naval surface craft. There is nothing new about that, however. That has always been true. It follows naturally that it would be of great potential worth in time of war or threatened war.

The question the committee raises, however, is why all this haste at this time? Why embark on a vast project, which, we are told, will cost $277,000,000, but which will cost, as a matter of truth, nobody knows what amount, because detailed plans and specifications for the structural features have not even been started. It will take at least 2 years to finish these plans.

Of course, as the gentleman from Virginia says, other work could be accomplished while this planning work is going on, but I fear much of it would have to be done over or abandoned.

We are going forward just as rapidly as possible with the protection of the existing waterway against sabotage and air attack. We are spending something like $39,000,000 on that work. As to rushing the work as a defense measure, as the chairman of this subcommittee said here yesterday, a "project that cannot be completed for 6 years is difficult to get excited about." It has been needed as a defense measure ever since the airplane became a weapon of destruction, and that was about simultaneous with the completion of the present Canal.

As to its early need because of the growing size of ships, commercial and naval, the present Canal is capable of transiting every naval ship now built, building, or at this time projected. It is my belief that we have reached the peak in size of capital ships. If we have not then, besides this auxiliary waterway, we should immediately start dredging our harbors and building drydocks up and down both coasts, and possibly begin replacing our largest seacoast guns with guns to stand off these dreamed-of superdreadnaughts. Those things require much time, too. The Navy is not advocating them. Parenthetically, I may add that I believe that we shall wake up some day not far hence and stop squandering money on these outmoded large targets for submarines, mines, and aerial bombs.

The gentleman from Virginia speaks of the danger of sabotage. If we should go to larger ships, sabotage would be concentrated upon the new locks—not the present ones—and instead of having an auxiliary waterway available we might have nothing, because the locks of the existing waterway would be inadequate.

Mr. Chairman, I have read the gentleman's statement of yesterday; I have read and examined the matter contained in House Document No. 210, to which he referred; I have studied the situation in the Canal Zone on the ground on many occasions; I have heard the subject discussed pro and con year after year in connection with annual appropriation measures; and I am of the decided opinion that the proper and logical course for us to pursue here today is to follow the recommendation of your Appropriations Committee.

As to its pressing urgency, I should also like to call attention to the fact that the matter is before us now, not as an urgent deficiency item, but in the regular annual Budget. Had the administration viewed it as extremely emergent, I submit we would have found an estimate for an immediate appropriation lying here when we convened back in January.

I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. CULKIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I call the attention of the House to an article appearing in the New York Herald of today, on page 16, on this identical problem of a bypass for the Panama Canal. It was written by Maj. George Fielding Eliot, who, I understand, is now out of the service, but to my mind is an outstanding authority on the Army and the Navy and international relations. His book, The Ramparts We Watch, has become a textbook for both the Army and the Navy at this time. I rise merely to call the attention of the Committee to just one phase of his discussion of this question. Under a subhead, Need of New Locks Stressed, he states:

> The Panama Canal is the key to our whole naval strategy. Without it we would be compelled to maintain two fleets instead of one. If it were closed our interest in one ocean might be disastrously affected before the fleet could get there from the other.

In other words, if the Panama Canal is blocked by sabotage or otherwise, and the war is in the Pacific, that portion of our fleet which is in the Atlantic Ocean is out of action unless it goes around Cape Horn.

Later I shall ask permission of the House to include as a part of my remarks the article referred to, and I invite the careful attention of all Members who are concerned with naval affairs to this very timely and able article, from an eminent authority.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CULKIN. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Did I understand the gentleman to say that Major Eliot wrote this article?

Mr. CULKIN. Yes. He is a very distinguished writer on this question. Being on this committee the gentleman must know about his book, The Ramparts We Watch.

Mr. SNYDER. I understood the gentleman to say that he is the outstanding authority.

Mr. CULKIN. I think he is an outstanding authority.

Mr. SNYDER. Then let me say I think the outstanding authority on these matters is John Pugh, the clerk of this committee for the last 23 years.

Mr. CULKIN. I concede that; but I ask some consideration after Mr. Pugh for Major Eliot.

[From the New York Herald Tribune]

MAJOR ELIOT SAYS CANAL DEFENSE REQUIRES AID OF UNITED STATES NEIGHBORS—ONLY DANGER, HE FEELS, IS FROM A SURPRISE ATTACK BY A POWERFUL AIR FLEET, AND A 600-MILE-WIDE CIRCLE OF OUTPOSTS WOULD ALLAY ALL FEAR

(By Maj. George Fielding Eliot)

President Roosevelt, after a tour of inspection of the defenses of the Panama Canal, a tour which included adjacent waters and islands, has recommended that the defense zone of the Canal be considerably extended in area. This of course involves a certain amount of cooperation from neighboring nations, especially if the defense zone is to cover a radius of 600 miles, as reported.

The basic considerations affecting the defense of the Panama Canal are not generally understood by the public at large. The Canal is hardly likely to be attacked by a great overseas expeditionary force. In the Pacific it is much too far from any base possessed by any major power capable of landing such an attack. In the Atlantic, the distances, though less, are still prohibitive for practical purposes, and the Canal is covered by our naval control over the entrances to the Caribbean Sea, which, in the strategical sense, is rapidly being converted into an American lake.

In any case, the garrison and defenses of the Canal even now are such that to promise success, an expedition of this sort would have to be a major effort, involving large numbers of troops and ships, a strong supporting air force and, above all, naval control of the ocean across which it was launched. Lacking such control, no general staff in its senses would think of risking anything of the sort.

SURPRISE CALLED ESSENTIAL

Attack in force being out of the question, it follows that the major premise of Canal defense must be defense against surprise. Here it may be remarked that no attack on the Canal is likely to be made with the object of getting possession of it and using it. In the first place, it is difficult to see what use could be made of the Canal by any foreign power that would justify the risk involved. In the second place, as the Canal is much closer to the seat of our national power than to any other, if it were taken it could probably not be held, nor its uninterrupted use enjoyed. In the third place, if about to be overwhelmed, our garrison would hardly be kind enough to leave the Canal in working order to fall into enemy hands. Hence, if the Canal is attacked, the object will be the interruption of traffic through it, probably the interruption of American naval traffic, and if the attempt is made it must be made by surprise.

Now, the defense against surprise of an immovable object, lying well outside the national boundaries, is a complicated and difficult business. First of all, it confines the defenders to a more or less static attitude, at least until some hostile action manifests itself. It abandons the initiative to the enemy; the first move is his. The best that can be done is to provide against every contingency that can be foreseen, and then hope that no enemy thinks of something we have not provided against. Only when the enemy has shown his hand, or at least played his first card, can we take the offensive and begin our counteraction.

So far as may be foreseen, the means by which the Canal may be attacked by surprise, with a view to interrupting traffic through it, are:

1 Sabotage or the action of secret agents.
2. Naval bombardment of the locks.
3. Raiding parties.
4. Air attack.

SABOTAGE DEFENSE STRONG

Defense against sabotage and secret agents is a matter of eternal vigilance, of guarding vital points, of keeping watch on suspicious characters, of controlling and guarding rigidly the movements of foreign ships through the Canal. This is being done, and done efficiently. No such system is invulnerable, human ingenuity and human frailty being what they are; but the chances are heavily against the success of any attempt of the sort.

Defense against naval bombardment of the locks is provided by long-range guns, bombing planes, and submarines. It is unlikely that any admiral would risk his expensive and unreplaceable battleships within reach of these weapons on the off chance of damaging a lock; still less likely that the attempt would succeed if made.

Raiding parties to attack the Canal might be landed secretly on the coast of the Republic of Panama, or might make their way there from a neighboring country. But the traveling is extremely difficult and detection before reaching any vulnerable part of the Canal would be almost certain, especially as the raiding party would have to be a very strong one, since it would have to seize possession of a lock or spillway dam against opposition, and hold it long enough to place explosive charges to destroy it. Since there are now three regiments of infantry in the Canal garrison, this does not seem a promising method of attack.

There remains air attack. To interrupt traffic through the Canal by bombing, both channels of one of the locks must be destroyed, or a spillway dam must be blasted open to let the water out of Gatun Lake. This is not a matter of a raiding plane with two or three bombs. It is a matter of enough planes to produce a sufficient concentration of fire to destroy massive concrete structures, which are less easily injured by the detonation of high explosives against them in the open air than many persons imagine. A considerable force of bombing planes, and fighter planes to protect them, would be needed. Of course, a lucky hit might disable a lock gate, but two gates, one in each channel, would have to be destroyed to stop traffic, and then the operation would have to be repeated when the spare gates which are available had been put in place.

All this means that an air attack on the Canal, if it hopes for success, must be in strength. It must be launched from an aircraft carrier or carriers, or from a land base within striking distance. Carriers cannot easily approach the Canal undetected, are very vulnerable, could hardly hope to penetrate the Caribbean on one side, and would be an enormous distance from any conceivable base on the other (Pacific) side.

A land air base would have to be established in the territory of some Latin-American state. Such a base capable of serving the number of aircraft needed for an attack on the Canal would be difficult to conceal, and would itself be vulnerable to attack by our long-range bombers once it was detected. We are well enough served in this part of the world to render it improbable that a large number of bombing aircraft, with all their personnel, fuel, bombs, and supplies, could be brought together at any point within striking distance of the Canal without our being informed of the fact * * * though the closer relations we maintain with the Canal's neighbors, the safer we shall be. But "improbable" and "unlikely" are dangerous words. They do not imply absolute security.

Therefore the Canal must still be immediately defended against air attack by antiaircraft artillery and by pursuit aviation. The effectiveness of these weapons depends almost altogether on the amount of warning they receive. This requires a warning net, and the effectiveness of a warning net depends in turn very largely on the distances of its outlying listening posts from the point to be defended. If the Canal defenses could have a warning net with outposts in the territory or island possessions of neighboring countries (a glance at the map will be sufficient to indicate several suitable locations) the Canal would be much safer. Incidentally, the 600 miles which the President is said to have mentioned is just about the limit of the radius of action of average bombers.

NEED OF NEW LOCKS STRESSED

The Panama Canal is the key to our whole naval strategy. Without it we would be compelled to maintain two fleets instead of one. If it were closed, our interest in one ocean might be disastrously affected before the fleet could get there from the other. No precaution to assure its safety can we afford to neglect. It is regrettable in the last degree that plans for the new set of locks (doubling the effort required for successful air attack and practically eliminating the chance of sabotage) should not have been pushed more speedily, and that Congress should have cut out the appropriation for this purpose.

But free and assured interoceanic transit for our fleet is so absolutely vital to our security that surely, sooner or later, in addition to taking every needful measure at Panama, we must come to the making of assurance doubly sure by the construction of a second canal in Nicaragua.

Mr. MOTT. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the pro forma amendment and for the purpose of saying a word about the item for flood control in this appropriation bill. I realize, of course, the futility of offering an amendment to increase the appropriation for any item in this or, for that matter, in any other appropriation bill which may be before the Congress at the present session. The Congress this year is definitely economy-minded, and it has consistently refused to increase any of the Budget estimates.

I do, however, wish to make a statement in regard to the appropriation for flood control because, although we know we cannot increase it, if we do not want its obvious inadequacy to go unchallenged and unnoticed.

It has been considered by those most interested in this activity that an amendment to increase the flood-control item could not possibly be adopted in the House, and that the cause of flood control would not be helped any by bringing on a fight here; rather, it might injure our chances of securing favorable action in the Senate, where hard and fast adherence to the Budget estimates have not been quite so pronounced. But I call attention of the House, nevertheless, to the inadequacy of this flood-control appropriation. The engineers, as you know, asked for $206,000,000 to carry on the orderly national flood-control program for 1941.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOTT. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. POWERS. The engineers did not ask for that amount.

Mr. MOTT. Yes; that is the amount they asked for.

Mr. POWERS. Did they not say that it could be profitably expended?

Mr. MOTT. Oh, yes; that is always the customary form of their language in making recommendations.

Mr. POWERS. May I say to the gentleman, as I said to a gentleman yesterday, that is the same as a man having a $4,000 house stating that he could spend $500 profitably for repairs on the house if he had the money? We do not have the money.

Mr. MOTT. I think the gentleman is confused in regard to the form and manner in which the engineers make their recommendations to the Appropriations Subcommittees. They make their recommendations by stating that a certain amount of money can be profitably expended over a certain period on a certain program or project. That is the form in which all of their recommendations are made. As I say, they recommended the expenditure of $206,000,000 to carry on the national flood-control problem for the year 1941, and the Budget cut that amount down to $70,000,000. Now, with this kind of drastic reduction, if it should be continued in subsequent years, the flood-control program of the United States will be strung out indefinitely, and I think the tendency of this administration to cut down year by year on flood control, as well as on rivers and harbors improvement, must be apparent to everyone.

I hope when this bill goes over to the Senate we may be able to get an increase in that appropriation there; and, if so, when it comes back to the House, I trust that all those interested in flood control will take a united stand in support of a motion to concur in the Senate amendment.

I am sure I do not need to tell any Member of this body about the importance or the necessity of the value of flood control. You are all familiar with that. I will say merely that in the opinion of people generally, both in the Congress and throughout the country, there is no more valuable Federal activity than the effective control of the floods in our major streams. There is no activity that is more in need of immediate and effective prosecution at this time. You are familiar with that and with the reasons why that is so. It is my opinion that we ought to prosecute the program in accordance with the plans already authorized by law, and that we can do that and practice rigid economy at the same time.

Two years ago the Flood Control Committees of the House and Senate mapped out a comprehensive national program for flood control. That program, which is embraced in the 1938 Flood Control Act, is composed of certain projects which up to that time had been approved by the Board of Army Engineers and submitted to the Congress through the Secretary of War. Out of these individual authorized projects the Flood Control Committee made its national program, with the view of solving the problem of flood control for the whole country, and the Congress, in adopting this program, declared its intention of carrying out the plan in accordance with the authorization act.

The 1938 act, of course, did not include all the projects which had been approved by the Board of Engineers and reported to the Congress. It included only about one-third of those projects. The reason the Flood Control Committee limited its program to its present scope was because it believed that if it confined itself to a comparatively small program it could make a definite beginning on each of the projects authorized in the act and that it could complete all of those projects within the space of 5 years.

Now, you will remember that it was at the request of the President that the committee limited its authorized program to one-third of what the committee first intended, and it was thoroughly understood by all of us that funds were to be provided to make a start upon and to continue the limited program and to complete it in 5 years. But after we passed the 1938 bill, and after the Board of Army Engineers had made its estimates for the first year's work, the Budget Bureau made a drastic slash in the amount recommended by the engineers. The Budget cut it practically in two. The result was that in the last year we were not able to get a proper start on flood-control program at all.

About half the projects authorized in the 1938 act have not even been begun, and the engineers were obliged to use all the money appropriated to make even a fair beginning on the few that are now under way. They hoped this year they could get the rest of them started, but to the amazement of everybody the Budget estimates for 1941 were cut down to less than half of the 1940 appropriation. At this rate new projects will never get started, and the comprehensive program authorized by the Congress will thus be defeated.

I think this particular field is the wrong place to commence the economy program. Everybody is aware how and where an economy program should start. It should start by cutting those activities of the Government which are practically worthless. It is there that economy should start, and if you cut deep enough into these worthless activities you will not have to interfere with the legitimate activities of the Government. Hundreds of millions of dollars could be saved by eliminating these worthless activities altogether, but the fact is that the Budget cuts in those particular activities have been almost negligible. They still flourish, while the legitimate activities starve.

As you are all aware, I am particularly interested in the Willamette Valley flood-control project. This is natural, since it is in my own district, and since I was the author of the legislation which authorized the original flood-control survey which finally resulted in the inclusion of this project in the 1938 flood-control authorization bill. This project will cost $64,000,000 when completed and will be the outstanding project of its kind and size in the country. I want this project completed within the 5-year period. I do not want it to be strung out indefinitely. I do not want to take twice as long to complete it as was contemplated under the 1938 Flood Control Act.

But I speak here not so much for my own project as for the national flood-control program as a whole. I have no fear that the Willamette project will not be completed. We have already spent upon it $5,000,000. That was the initial appropriation, which was provided last year. We will get a substantial allotment out of the present appropriation for the next year's work even if the Budget estimates are not increased. A project of that magnitude once started cannot be stopped. But I want not only this project completed. I want every project authorized in the 1938 act completed; and I think in all fairness to all parts of the country this appropriation ought to be increased at least enough to make an actual substantial start on every one of those projects. The Congress can do this and still practice economy by reducing the appropriations for those governmental activities which all of us know serve little, if any, useful purpose.

Mr. HINSHAW. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. We are at this point in the bill discussing the Panama Canal. I call the attention of the House to the fact that the Panama Canal owns the Panama Railroad, and the Panama Railroad in turn owns the Panama Railroad Steamship Co. This line operates three steamships between the Panama Canal Zone and New York, in which materials are hauled to the Canal for use there very largely. The rates for the hauling of this material are quite low; for example, the rate is $2.50 per ton for cement which is to be used in the construction of the Canal Zone. On the Pacific coast our rate is necessarily much higher, because the haulage must be done by private steamship lines. It is $7 a ton for the same thing. I have before me an open letter addressed jointly to the Honorable Harry Woodring, Secretary of War, Washington, D. C., and Admiral Emory S. Land, Chairman of the Maritime Commission, Washington, D. C., which reads as follows:

[From the Los Angeles Examiner of February 24, 1940]

BOAKE CARTER SCORES LOS ANGELES HARBOR SHIPPING RATE

(Boake Carter, widely read Examiner columnist, writes of inequalities in shipping rates affecting Los Angeles Harbor, studied during a recent visit here.)

LOS ANGELES.

To the Honorable HARRY WOODRING,
Secretary of War,
Washington, D. C.
To Admiral EMORY S. LAND,
Chairman, Maritime Commission,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR HARRY AND JERRY: I would like to nominate for occupancy of the doghouse once again the Panama Railroad Steamship Co.

You remember, Harry, back 4 or 5 years ago—that was before the Commission was born, Jerry—that evidence in the forms of consignment sheets and bills of lading was produced to show that the Panama Railroad Steamship Co. was carrying American-made goods from New York to the Canal Zone. Then they encouraged transshipment on foreign-flag ships, especially German boats, on down south, ignoring completely the fact that privately operated American-flag ships were available for those transshipments?

Do you remember at that time the Panama Railroad Steamship Co. was running junkets for Congressmen; was operating parallel to the old Colombia Steamship Line and other United States lines in direct competition; cut its freight rates and passenger charges way below what the private operators could charge? And remember the people who knew this condition remarked that that was a hell of a way for the United States Government to encourage private enterprise and the American merchant marine. The Colombia, by the way, had to quit and go out of business.

I remember, Harry, you investigated, and the Panama Railroad Steamship Co. nabobs came back with spacious and circuitous arguments, all evading the issue.

Since the Panama Railroad Steamship Co. is owned by the Panama Railroad Co., and the latter is owned by the United States Government, under the direction of the War Department, it seems not unreasonable to me to nominate the steamship company for the doghouse again for some new and additional monekyshines, not to mention loss of private business it is causing to people of many Western and Northwestern States of this country.

The Government intends to widen the locks of the canal, I take it. This means that there'll be a considerable amount of business for American manufacturers and the American workmen employed by them. Steel, cement, lumber, machine-tool makers of the West would like to get a crack at this business just as much as the Easterners. They would ship out of Los Angeles to the Canal Zone. But they can't, Harry—the freight-rate differential is prohibitive.

Now, Jerry, you explained last November to Senator DOWNEY, of California, that the rates couldn't be equalized, and you quoted a communication from Harry's War Department justifying difference in rates from New York and Los Angeles to the Canal Zone. You, Jerry, disclaimed the Government-owned Panama Railroad Steamship Co. was discriminating against private operation, since the real reason, you said, was that Pacific coast ports are farther away from the Canal Zone than New York or Gulf ports.

Now, Jerry, you wouldn't be trying to kid anyone, would you? To try to justify the big difference in rates on the grounds of "distance" is hooey. And Harry, that goes for the War Department, too, since Jerry was quoting one of your official memos. Maybe you personally didn't have a thing to do with it, but it sounds as though it were written by somebody who didn't know a thing about ocean freight rates, or hoped to fool someone. At any rate, Jerry, being a seaman, you should have known better than to try and palm it off on the public.

From Los Angeles to Balboa the distance is 2,913 miles. From New York to Colon it is 1,974 miles. Your Government-owned Panama Railroad Steamship Line is carrying cement for the new construction on the Canal from New York to Colon at $2.50 a ton. From Los Angeles to Balboa, it is $7 a ton. That makes a difference of $4.50 a ton for a difference of 939 miles in distance. Now you, Jerry, say that's justified because some chump in Harry's department said so.

Then will you explain to the people, Jerry, how come the rates from New York to Seattle, 6,038 miles, and New York to Los Angeles, 4,930 miles, are uniformly the same, with a difference of 1,108 miles? If there's a difference of $4.50 a ton to the Panama Canal Zone because of a difference of 939 miles, why no difference in rates for a discrepancy of 1,108 miles?

Or, Jerry, how about this? Singapore to New York via Suez is 10,172 miles; Singapore to Los Angeles is 7,866 miles. A difference there of 2,306 miles. The rate on crude rubber over the 10,000-mile route is $14 a ton and over the 7,800-mile route is $13.50 a ton. A difference of 50 cents for 2,300 miles, Jerry—and yet you are trying to kid these westerners out here that it's O. K. for a Government-owned steamship company to resort to below-cost, sweatshop rates because of a 900-mile differential.

But, Harry, here's where you come in. The annual report of the Governor of the Canal to the Secretary of War—that's you—for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1939, shows your steamship line lost $87,005.35. But the neatest trick is how your department wipes out that deficit. It does it through operation of the docks in the Canal Zone, all of which are also owned by your Department's Panama Railroad, the same outfit that owns your steamships. These docks kicked in with $1,936,016 in revenue for 1939. This came from a toll of $1 per ton assessed by the Panama Railroad on all cargo entering the Canal Zone. For instance, on every ton of freight out of Los Angeles to the Canal Zone the private shipper in Los Angeles has to pay $1 per ton to the Panama Railroad. The Panama Railroad takes that money it levies on private business to pay for the losses it incurs with its own ships, competing against private business at below-cost prices. And the below-cost operation is caused by inefficient operation and low rates allowed the eastern shippers.

Now, if that is what is called encouragement of private enterprise, then I begin to suspect you've both gone New Deal on us.

By the way, the public pays taxes to support the War Department's operations. Some of that dough goes to keep the Panama Railroad out of hock. It seems then that the public is socked twice—through taxes, and by being forced to kick in with another dollar per ton on all private freight.

That to me is a good example of the most pernicious form of Government competition with private industry; Government destruction of the very system the Government yells all the time should be maintained. It prevents private industry from pulling its share of the load, which Mr. Roosevelt, your boss, says it should, and bars employment of people who must otherwise remain on relief.

Yours,

BOAKE CARTER.

P. S.—I hope you two fellows don't mind my drawing your attention to this example of Americanism on the part of the Government's War Department and Maritime Commission.—B. C.

Mr. Chairman, I do not vouch for the accuracy of the figures used by Mr. Boake Carter, but I understand that the gentleman is careful in that respect and I am inclined to rely upon them. I feel so because I myself have attempted to dig into the statistics to learn why it is that we on the Pacific coast are, by virtue of Government-established freight rates on Government vessels operating exclusively on the east coast, barred from selling our products in the Canal Zone to Government agencies. It is, in my humble judgment, a great wrong to the Pacific Coast States that is being done by our Government, and I hope that this day will see the beginning of a movement to right this wrong.

This wrong may be righted in more than one way. The most apparent way, possibly, would be for the Government to establish a service on the Pacific coast similar to that now in operation on the east coast, with approximately an equal or equitably equivalent set of freight rates. Another way would be for the Government to charge rates for its present service commensurate with those that would necessarily be charged by a privately owned and operated steamship company. Still another way would be to allow a compensating differential premium in price on west-coast products. I commend this subject to your earnest consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. BOREN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words.

Mr. Chairman, I came here today with the intention of supporting an amendment that I believed was going to be offered by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BLAND] to add a third lock on the Panama Canal. It has only been a few months since I was in the Canal Zone and made a thorough inspection of the Canal, and I found the universal sentiment amongst military men there that a third lock was vitally necessary to the defense of the United States of America.

It goes without question that this lock may decide the fate of America at war. It is generally known that we cannot even build a battleship of the new and enlarged sizes that other navies can build because the present locks are not wide enough to let a large battleship go through.

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOREN. I yield.

Mr. POWERS. We had testimony before our committee that any naval vessel now on the seas or under construction can go through the Canal, and from the gentleman's statement I am inclined to believe that the only reason in the world for a new set of locks is probably some of the super-salesmanship of the Navy, who are about to sell 80,000-ton battleships that cannot go through the present locks.

Mr. BOREN. Does not the gentleman agree that all battleships are now built so that they can go through the locks, and with that in mind?

Mr. POWERS. And all under construction are built with that in mind.

Mr. BOREN. Does not the gentleman believe that that is a handicap on construction for our Navy?

Mr. POWERS. I hope it is some handicap on super-construction for our Navy.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOREN. I yield.

Mr. TERRY. In the speech of our distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON], chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, at page 1517 of the RECORD of February 15, during the consideration of the Navy bill, there is this language:

> Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
> Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Yes.
> Mr. MAY. I do not know that the gentleman has specifically so stated, but I think it is clear that the 45,000-ton battleships can go through the Panama Canal's present locks, and, therefore, they are not in excess of the size that can be used.
> Mr. VINSON of Georgia. That is correct.

Now, so far all our present battleships and all battleships of 45,000 tons, the largest that we contemplate for any time soon, can go through the locks.

Mr. BOREN. The gentleman is absolutely correct. Naturally, we have not built and will not build a battleship that is too big to go through this vital artery of our defense. The width of all our present battleships is determined by the width of the present locks. For years we have built top-heavy ships because of this difficulty. Let me say further with reference to the statement by the gentleman a little earlier, that sabotage could destroy these canal locks, one time bomb could put out of commission this entire artery for an indefinite time. We should build a third lock and restrict its use to our Navy, and our Navy alone. I think the House is making a mistake by leaving it up to the Senate to put in this amendment which our national defenses demand.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last five words.

Mr. Chairman, I am entirely familiar with the problems involved and conscious of the needs there, but I want to serve notice on the Members of the House that we from the Northwest districts will certainly object to any further expenditure for improvements or alterations or for any purpose in the Panama Canal so long as we cannot get justice in the way of waterways or freight rates up in the Northwest. We are land-locked up there and are constantly going down economically and industrially and in every other way because of the effect which the Panama Canal and the immense amount of tonnage which is going through there has on our economy. While I, of course, cannot speak for the other Members from the Northwest and will not attempt to, nevertheless I am sure that most of them will go along with me and not support any further appropriations for extensions at the Panama Canal.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALEXANDER. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN. I just want to ask the gentleman to get one of the committee clerks to prepare a recapitulation of the money that the Congress has authorized and appropriated for the Northwest. If he does he will find that it is more than the cost of the Panama Canal.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Well, that is somewhat along the line I wanted to discuss.

Mr. Chairman, we have had spent on the upper Mississippi River improvements up to date, according to the figures of the Army engineers, $147,191,000. We need an additional $22,809,000 to complete the work there and make it maximumly useful and effective. The Army engineers brought in a request for funds for 75 items to the Budget Bureau and the Appropriations Committee. Those 75 items totaled $73,226,800. In that $73,226,800 was an item of $17,989,000 for the 1941 fiscal year, to be applied on that $22,800,000 item that we need to complete the work up there—to put a roof on the house which we here in Congress have already built. What did the Bureau of the Budget do with those 75 items, which of course are for districts all over the United States? The Budget Bureau cut them all down but 18 items, and if I can get a little more time I will tell you what those 18 items were, because it is an interesting record and I want to put it in the RECORD at this point. The 18 favored items follow:

Connecticut River below Hartford, Conn	$75,000
Manhasset Harbor, N. Y	63,000
Irvington Harbor, N. Y	15,000
Rahway River, N. J	35,400
Great Kills Harbor, Staten Island, N. Y	114,500
St. Jones River, Del	262,700
Harbor of Refuge, Delaware Bay, Del	65,000
Oldmans Creek, N. J	88,800
Fishing Creek, Md	95,000
Intracoastal Waterway, Jacksonville–Miami, Fla	20,000
Palm Beach, Fla., side channel and basin	114,000
Ouachita River and Black River, Ark. and La	36,000
Racine Harbor, Wis	72,600
Suisun Channel, Calif	135,500
San Francisco Harbor, Calif	287,000
Bodega Bay, Calif	540,000
Neah Bay, Wash	500,000
Illiuliuk Harbor, Alaska	60,000

You will notice from the above list that almost without exception—I believe there are only two—these projects are either on the east or west coast, thus giving still more advantage to those sections as compared to our land-locked area in the Northwest. It would be interesting to ascertain just how these 18 favored projects were arrived at, and just why we were left out entirely along with 26 other projects.

In that $17,989,000 which the Army engineers asked for to proceed with the work on the upper river there is an item of $3,845,500, which they propose to use for the building of necessary locks at the great historic Falls of St. Anthony. By building these locks, this would give us a harbor so we could make use of this $147,000,000 which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN] is worrying about and which has already been expended for the improvement of the upper Mississippi River. Every cent of this will be returned to the Nation many times over in savings made possible not only to the Northwest but to the entire Nation in years to come by increased business and lowered living costs, which will result and combine to re-create the former prosperity of our resourceful, rich, and fertile Northwest area and to reestablish better business conditions for the whole Nation, if we can utilize this river highway to the fullest extent, as we will be able to if this small additional sum is expended up there.

In the $3,845,500 for the starting of locks at the Falls of St. Anthony are four items:

Dredging below lower lock	$501,700
Dredging above upper lock	536,200
Construction of lower lock	2,632,500
Design	175,100
	3,845,500

Now, if we are going to be prevented under the terms of this bill from starting this work, what is going to happen in case we are embroiled, and I hope we will not be, in this war in a year or two, and you want to get foodstuffs out of that great Northwest breadbasket? You will have the same situation, or worse than you had in 1918, which is one of the blackest in our history, when the freight trains were so piled up there, and traffic on the railroads was so congested that you could not get freight out of or into that great district on which our soldiers at the front must depend for much of their foodstuffs. The result then was that the Government had to take over the railroads, and I will venture to predict now that the condition will be worse next time, because the railroads have not been able to keep up with the necessity to replace their worn-out and antiquated equipment. Ask any railroad man what their situation is, or ask the War Department—they can tell you right now—that they are having the jitters because of the apparent shortage of rolling stock and locomotives, and still we fiddle here while Rome burns.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. In the 3 remaining minutes I want to call, Mr. Chairman, to the attention of the members of the subcommittee the fact that although you agreed to allot $2,788,500 for work in the Upper Mississippi as compared to the nearly $18,000,000 I have already shown you is desired for 1941 by the Army engineers, not a penny of that can be used in starting work at Minneapolis. This morning I obtained from the Army engineers a break-down of how they intend to use this $2,788,500, and I want to put that in the RECORD so you may know exactly where this money is going to be spent, because some of the members of the committee do not seem to know the exact situation and engineers' plan under this very limited appropriation.

This break-down shows that none of it is going to the project in Minneapolis. They are going to use three-quarters of the amount for putting guards or guide walls at nine sites. These sites are Genoa, Lynxville, Guttenburg, Dubuque, LeClaire, Rock Island, Muscatine, Canton, and Quincy.

Twenty-five percent of this item of $2,788,500 is to be used for the purpose of dredging three little harbors—the one at LeClaire, the one at Muscatine, and the one at Canton. This and the nine items above will require all the money the bill carries for work on the upper Mississippi from St. Louis to Minneapolis. This leaves us absolutely out in the cold.

Remember this, also, this thing has been under way now going on 5 years; Congress has approved and authorized the project, still you are holding back and refusing to make it possible to utilize that upper river barge highway and to get the full, maximum benefit out of the one-hundred-and forty-seven-million-odd dollars you have already appropriated and expended up there. Is it good sense? Is it good business to do that? Or should we increase this item in the pending appropriation bill above the Budget estimate so as to prosecute this work and get this magnificent river highway in use to the fullest extent to the advantage of all sections of the country, in a manner advantageous to our agriculture, our trade and industry, our commerce, and our citizens? [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

FLOOD CONTROL IN OREGON—THE WILLAMETTE BASIN PROJECT

Mr. Chairman, the Corps of Army Engineers reported to the Bureau of the Budget that they could profitably use during the fiscal year beginning July 1, 1941, $206,624,000 in flood control for the projects heretofore authorized, one of which is the Willamette Basin project in Oregon. However, the Bureau of the Budget reduced the amount requested to $70,000,000 only, which amount is carried in the pending bill. Under the requested allowance of $206,624,000 the United States Army engineers contemplated allocating the following amounts for the Willamette Basin project—hearings, page 146:

McKenzie River	$62,000
Tualatin River Dam	500,100
Dorena Reservoir	1,960,800
Fern Ridge Reservoir	1,046,900
Detroit	2,138,000
Detailed surveys and plans	1,000,000
Willamette River proper (bank protection)	710,600
Total	7,418,400

It is not necessary, of course, to restate the reasons which induced the Congress to authorize the construction of this project, which had been recommended by the Board of Army Engineers. Suffice it to say, however, that the Willamette Valley, included in the project, contains a drainage area of approximately 11,200 square miles, which is nearly as large as Holland. It has a north and south dimension of approximately 150 miles, and an average width of 75 miles. It lies between the Coast Range Mountains on the west and the Cascade Mountains on the east, and the Calapooya Mountains on the south. The valley floor proper contains an area of approximately 3,500 square miles, a great portion of which lies below an elevation of 500 feet. The climate is mild, having a minimum annual temperature for the year of 53 degrees, and the growing season averages around 210 days in length, and the frost-free period usually extends from April 1 to the end of October. The mean annual precipitation in the basin varies from a minimum of about 40 inches on the lower levels to 100 inches in the mountains.

If this precipitation were evenly distributed throughout the year it would be wholly sufficient to sustain the agricultural development in the valley, but the rainfall during summer is light and frequently from 30 to 60 days at this season there is no rain at all. This is very destructive to crops, requiring some additional irrigation.

On the other hand, the heavy rainfall in the winter, together with melting snows, presents a flood danger which, through the years, results in immense damage to property, and even the loss of life. Major Moore, of the Corps of Engineers, reports that the average annual damages in this basin resulting from floods is $1,693,000.

While this project is designed for flood control, it also serves a multipurpose in that it not only will prevent the flooding of this area but will also provide in the seven storage basins ample water for irrigation. There are 1,373,000 acres of irrigable area in the valley, of which 700,000 is adapted to supplemental irrigation. In addition to flood control and irrigation the project also provides for the improvement of navigation in the Willamette River, which is the waterway draining this whole area. At the present time there are 145 sawmills and 7 pulp and paper mills in the area. There are approximately 5,000,000 acres of timberland, containing an estimated 124,000,000,000 board feet. About 80 percent of this is Douglas fir. The current annual growth in the basin of timber is estimated at 615,000,000 board feet, which may be materially increased by sustained forestry practice. The tillable lands within the area are of a high quality, producing varied agricultural products, and is particularly adapted to diversified farming. The timber and agricultural products, as well as mercantile and industrial development, amply justify the improvement of the navigation facilities of the Willamette River.

Mr. Chairman, with funds heretofore appropriated by the Congress, the Army engineers are now actively engaged in prosecuting this work. They are constructing the Fern Ridge project on the Long Tongue River near Eugene, and have been engaged in making surveys, borings, and acquiring preliminary data on various other portions of the project. Notwithstanding the general urge for retrenchment in governmental expenditures, it would be unfortunate to refuse a sufficient appropriation for continuing work on this project, which is now in progress.

The Clerk read as follows:

There is also appropriated for the fiscal year 1941 for the operation, maintenance, and extension of waterworks, sewers, and pavements in the cities of Panama and Colon, to remain available until expended, the necessary portions of such sums as shall be paid during that fiscal year as water rentals or directly by the Government of Panama for such expenses.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LANHAM: Page 15, after line 16, add a new section, to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. No part of any appropriation contained in this act shall be used directly or indirectly after January 1, 1941, for the payment of any civilian for services rendered by him on the Canal Zone while occupying a skilled, technical, clerical, administrative, or supervisory position unless such person is a citizen of the United States."

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I have long been an advocate of American work for American workers. The amendment which I have introduced provides for the employment of citizens of the United States in the Canal Zone in those positions which are skilled, technical, clerical, administrative, and supervisory.

The Panama Canal Zone is a very important element of our national defense. May I bring it to your attention in the first place that this amendment does not place any limitation upon the employment of common labor. It is probably not practical to seek to introduce at this time an amendment which would restrict common labor in the Canal Zone to American citizens.

May I also call attention to the fact that this amendment does not take effect until January 1, 1941, thus allowing 10 full months for the necessary changes to be made.

Mr. Chairman, this is no legislative innovation. A similar provision appears in the law with reference to the construction of new locks in the Panama Canal. This House recently placed a similar amendment upon the naval appropriation bill.

I have been very much surprised to learn upon authority which I think is entirely reliable that in the skilled, clerical, technical, administrative, and supervisory positions there are now between 3,500 and 5,000 aliens working for our Government in the Panama Canal Zone. In other words, there are between 3,500 and 5,000 idle American workers in these capacities who would be given an opportunity to perform this labor if this amendment is adopted.

Mr. BLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. BLAND. Is the gentleman not referring to common labor? He does not have reference to the positions covered here.

Mr. LANHAM. My authority for the statement comes from a most reliable source, and I understand the number mentioned relates simply to labor of the character indicated in this amendment and not to common labor.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FISH. I just want to make sure in my mind the gentleman's amendment applies to American citizens.

Mr. LANHAM. It does.

Mr. FISH. Is that regardless of race, color, or creed?

Mr. LANHAM. It applies to all American citizens in these skilled, technical, clerical, administrative, and supervisory positions in the Canal Zone.

Mr. FISH. It would not discriminate against the American Negroes, would it?

Mr. LANHAM. It would not discriminate against anyone who is an American citizen.

Mr. FISH. That is all right with me. I am for it.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, something may be said with reference to the expense of carrying on this work with American citizens. In this connection may I call to your attention that there is pending before the Senate a bill, S. 3130, relating to the citizenship and compensation of certain employees on military construction work in the Panama Canal Zone. There is an identical bill, H. R. 7941, pending in the House. In the report of the Senate committee on that bill, there is included a letter from the Secretary of War under date of January 15, 1940. That bill contains the same provisions with reference to these various positions that my amendment contains, restricting the work to American citizens. The Secretary of War said in his statement:

It is not believed that the enactment of the proposed legislation will from a practical viewpoint result in any appreciable increased cost.

And even if it did increase the cost a bit, although the Secretary of War says that practically it will not, it is worth something to maintain the American standard of living and to give this opportunity for employment when it can be given in this way to 3,500 or 5,000 of our citizens.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM]?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, something may be said with reference to the fact that we employ these aliens down there because of the good-neighbor policy. I am quite as much in favor of the good-neighbor policy and friendly relations between the United States and Central and South American countries as anyone could be, but I do not think the good-neighbor policy can be construed to mean that American work shall be given to aliens and that we should, when this work is available, continue to keep our American labor unemployed. I think the duty is incumbent upon the Congress, especially with reference to the Panama Canal and its importance in our national defense and in our national economy, to have in these skilled, technical, clerical, administrative, and supervisory positions citizens of the United States of America.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. In addition to the point which the gentleman from Texas has brought out—namely, the desirability of giving employment to American citizens who are out of work—there is a further fact to which I personally can attest. Having been down to the Canal Zone several months ago and having conferred at length and confidentially with high officials there, including officers of the Army and Navy, I am informed that for many years the Canal Zone has been teeming with alien spies. It is unnecessary to specify, but anyone can accurately surmise, what nationalities predominate among these alien espionage agents; but they have been and are there beyond all doubt. I understand the Federal Bureau of Investigation and other agencies have been doing some good work down there of late. But, I submit, it would be most unfortunate to have employed on important military work in so vital a strategic point as the Canal Zone any skilled or technical workers who owe no allegiance to the United States.

Mr. LANHAM. I was thinking that the gentleman could see that implication between the lines of my remarks.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. I think the implication by the gentleman was very clear, but I believe it will do no harm to emphasize it at this time.

Mr. LANHAM. I am grateful to the gentleman.

Mr. KERR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. KERR. Does not the act of Congress which has to do with the construction of the third lock at the Panama Canal provide for just what the gentleman's amendment provides?

Mr. LANHAM. The act that has been passed with reference to the new locks?

Mr. KERR. Yes.

Mr. LANHAM. It does. The naval appropriation bill which we passed recently has this same provision in it also. There are pending bills both in the House and Senate with reference to military construction having this provision in it, and the Secretary of War has stated it will involve practically no additional cost.

In my remaining time I want to call attention to one further thing that may possibly be said. It may be urged that this amendment would be a violation of our treaty obligations, but I am reliably informed that the treaty between the United States and Panama, signed by the authorities of Panama in 1936, contains no inhibition against the policy proposed by this amendment and that the only thing which has occurred with reference to this particular feature since Panama signed that treaty was an exchange of notes between administrative and executive officers and not by legislative action. Since the treaty was signed by Panama in 1936, this very provision that I am suggesting has been placed in our law with reference to construction in the Panama Canal and was recently placed by similar amendment in the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. Chairman, in these times of unemployment, when capable American citizens are walking the streets and asking for jobs, I feel it is our duty to see to it that in our own American endeavor, for the protection of our country and for the facility of our commerce, we take some of these worthy citizens who are searching for employment and give them this good American opportunity to do American work. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I have here a letter from the Acting Secretary of War, dated today, February 29, which is an answer to questions that might be raised with reference to the amendment offered by our colleague the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM]. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, that the Clerk read this letter.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 29, 1940.

Hon. J. BUELL SNYDER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SNYDER: I have been advised that efforts will be made to amend the War Department civil functions appropriation bill to include a labor restriction similar to section 7 of bill H. R. 8438, making appropriations for the Navy Department for the fiscal year 1941.

Section 7 of bill H. R. 8438, as it passed the House February 16, 1940, provides:

"SEC. 7. No part of any appropriation contained in this act shall be used, directly or indirectly, after January 1, 1941, for the payment of any civilian for services rendered by them on the Canal Zone while occupying a skilled, technical, clerical, administrative, or supervisory position, unless such person is a citizen of the United States of America."

The application of such an amendment to the War Department civil functions appropriation bill would violate the treaty concluded with the Republic of Panama, March 2, 1936, which was proclaimed by the President July 27, 1939. The Government of the United States stands committed to the Government of the Republic of Panama to maintain as its public policy the principle of equality of opportunity for employment on the Panama Canal of Panamanian citizens with those of the United States, and to favor such measures as may be necessary to put this policy into effect.

This question was thoroughly discussed during the negotiations which resulted in the general treaty between the United States and Panama on March 2, 1936. At the time the general treaty was signed and as an accompaniment thereof, the Secretary of State addressed a note to the Panamanian negotiators in which he stated:

"* * * the Government of the United States of America, in recognition of the special relationship between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama with respect to the Panama Canal and the Panama Railroad Co., maintains and will maintain as its public policy the principle of equality of opportunity and treatment set down in the order of December 23, 1908, of the Secretary of War, and in the Executive orders of February 2, 1914, and February 20, 1920, and will favor the maintenance, enforcement, or enactment of such provisions, consistent with the efficient operation and maintenance of the Canal and its auxiliary works and their effective protection and sanitation, as will assure to Panamanian citizens employed by the Canal or the railroad equality of treatment with employees who are citizens of the United States of America."

This note was before the United States Senate when the treaty was ratified July 27, 1939.

The pertinent parts of the Executive orders referred to in the Secretary of State's note read as follows:

"Executive order of the Secretary of War, dated December 23, 1908:

"By authority of the President, it is ordered:

"That the Executive order of February 8, 1908, restricting the personnel of gold employees to American citizens be amended to read as follows:

" 'On and after this date, the employment by the Isthmian Canal Commission of skilled laborers, clerks, and all others who have heretofore been known as gold employees of the Commission shall be restricted to American citizens and citizens of Panama, except where American or Panamanian labor or services of the character required is not available.

" 'Foreign employees now upon the pay roll of the Commission shall not be affected by this order, save in the event of any reduction of force preference shall be accorded to American citizens and citizens of Panama.'

"Executive order dated February 2, 1914:

"6. All employees who receive over $75 per month or over 40 cents per hour must be citizens of the United States or the Republic of Panama and such citizens will be given preference for employment in all grades. Aliens may not be employed in such grades unless—

"(a) they have occupied similar positions during the construction of the Canal for 2 years or more; or

"(b) in case of emergency, in which latter case they must be replaced by citizens of the United States or Republic of Panama as early as practicable.

"Executive order dated February 20, 1920:

"1. That the Executive order of February 2, 1914, be so amended that paragraphs 6 and 20 thereof shall read as follows:

" 'PAR. 6. All employees who receive compensation at the rate of more than $960 a year or 40 cents an hour, must be citizens of the United States or the Republic of Panama, and such citizens will be given preference for employment in all grades. Aliens may not be employed in such grades unless (a) they have occupied similar positions during the construction of the Canal for 2 years or more, or (b) in case of emergency, in which latter case they must be replaced by citizens of the United States or Republic of Panama as early as practicable.' "

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be extended 5 minutes, and within that time I wish to ask him some questions.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, how much longer will it take to read this New Deal manifesto which indicates that although we have more than 11,000,000 Americans who cannot find a job we should give foreigners the jobs in our Panama Canal Zone national-defense program.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that unanimous consent was given for the reading of this letter and, therefore, it is not necessary that additional time be granted.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

In a radiogram just received, the Governor of the Panama Canal states that such restrictions in the War Department civil functions appropriation bill "would conflict with the commitments of our Government with respect to employment of Panamanians. The adoption of such an amendment would necessitate the discharge on January 1, 1941, of a number of persons on the pay roll of the Canal who are Panamanians and many of whom have been employed for a number of years." He further states: "The restrictions in the Third Locks Act, which would exclude Panamanians from a large number of positions, and the provisions of other bills now under consideration which would impose restrictions against the employment of Panamanians, have been very severely attacked in the local press for many weeks, although the Panamanian Government and press are assuming that by reason of President Roosevelt's assurances to the Panamanian Government, steps will be taken to secure adoption of legislation which would remove the application of these restrictions against Panamanians and to bring this legislation into line with the commitments of our Government in the 1936 treaty with respect to the employment of Panamanians."

The Governor also states that "In view of the President's commitments as to the eligibility of Panamanians to obtain employment in any capacity with the Canal, the community of interests which exists between the Governments of the United States and Panama and in view of the fact that the enactment of this legislation would most seriously retard the measures now under way for safeguarding the locks and other vital structures of the Canal, it is considered that the utmost endeavor should be made to secure the elimination of these amendments from all appropriations bills for expenditures within the Canal Zone, and more particularly from the civil-functions bill."

The President, in a statement made August 11, 1939, on approving bill H. R. 5129, authorizing the construction of additional locks, called attention to a somewhat similar labor restriction which was applicable to new personnel only and did not require the discharge of persons then employed. He stated that the provision included in that bill was a violation of the treaty with Panama and that he proposed to request the Congress to amend the law so as to bring it into conformity with the commitments entered into with Panama.

The Governor of the Panama Canal has called my attention to the fact that if the labor restriction in section 7 of bill H. R. 8438 were incorporated in the War Department civil-functions appropriation bill, it would require the discharge of many employees who have served the United States faithfully for many years and that to discharge them and eject them from the Canal Zone in practically destitute circumstances would be inhumane and unjustifiable. He pointed out that their status as aliens is generally due to their inability to acquire citizenship by virtue of their residence in the Canal Zone, since the naturalization laws do not apply there.

A restriction of this nature would, in effect, make an important change in the Government's policy of maintaining and operating the Panama Canal, which has been in effect successfully for more than 25 years. Such a change in policy should not be made without full hearings in order that the Congress may be fully informed as to its far-reaching effects. It would affect the regular operating force of the Panama Canal and therefore is much more objectionable than if applied only to a temporary construction force.

Sincerely yours,

L. D. GASSER,
Acting Secretary of War.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SYNDER. I am pleased to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. LANHAM. Is it not true that when Panama signed this treaty in 1936 there was no provision in it with reference to the holding of these skilled, technical, clerical, administrative, and supervisory positions by citizens of Panama?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes; but I understand that these notes were exchanged before the ratification by Congress.

Mr. LANHAM. Is it not correct that when Panama signed the treaty in 1936 there was no such provision in it?

Mr. SNYDER. That is correct, if I am advised correctly, but these notes were exchanged before our ratification.

Mr. LANHAM. Is it not also true that since that time we have passed laws with this provision in them?

Mr. SNYDER. Yes; but it is only fair to say they had quite limited application.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I wanted to get into this controversy somehow or other. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I really wanted to propound an inquiry of the gentleman from Texas if he would rise to his feet and respond to a question. Yesterday we authorized the expenditure of $100,000,000 for the relief of foreign nations. Is it not about time we do something in the way of relief for our own American unemployed?

Mr. LANHAM. I entertain that sentiment very vigorously myself. This is an effort on my part to make available somewhere between 3,500 and 5,000 places for unemployed American workers, allowing 10 months in which the exchange can be made in order not to interfere with the progress of the projects in the meantime.

Mr. FISH. That is not so very much to ask of Congress when there are 10,000,000 unemployed in America.

Mr. LANHAM. Not in my opinion.

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last four words.

Mr. Chairman, I did not object to the reading of the New Deal manifesto, the proclamation which our New Deal Secretary of War issued in favor of employing citizens of foreign countries in our Panama Canal national-defense program, notwithstanding the fact that we now have more than 11,000,000 of our American citizens who are out of a job, who want a job, and who cannot get a job, although for 7 long years we have had the benefit of the socialistic Karl Marx conception of government imported direct from Moscow by the New Deal.

I receive in my office, and no doubt many other Members of Congress receive, hundreds of letters each week asking for information with reference to the possibility of obtaining employment in the Government service. Many of these letters ask information with reference to obtaining employment in the Panama Canal program. Mr. Chairman, the pending amendment presents an important issue on which we must take a position. We must take a position on the side of 11,000,000 unemployed American citizens or on the side of unemployed foreign subjects who reside in foreign lands.

Remember that our good Lord said, "No man can serve two masters." He also said, "He that is not with me is against me"; and "wherefore by their fruits ye shall know them." Mr. Chairman, the vote on this amendment will reveal whether we serve and take a position on the side of our unemployed American citizens or whether we shall serve and take a position on the side of foreign subjects who reside in foreign lands. I choose to serve on the side of our unemployed American brethren. Mr. Chairman, we should also remember that this Panama Canal program is an essential and important part of our national defense. If we employ American citizens on the program there will be far less opportunity for alien agents to sabotage it.

I sincerely hope that the pending amendment offered by our very distinguished, lovable, and patriotic colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], will be adopted unanimously. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this is a War Department appropriation bill, and in connection with the pending amendment I would like to refer to the trouble that has been experienced in the Panama Canal Zone.

When the N. I. R. A. was enacted, we appropriated $3,300,000,000 for public work relief, and so forth, and the P. W. A. was established. A part of that fund was allotted to the Panama Canal Zone. A minimum scale of wages was established by P. W. A. for artisans, mechanics, and workmen on all public construction jobs performed by the P. W. A. During the Seventy-fourth Congress some improvements were made on the Panama Canal and a certain number of contractors secured these contracts, among whom was the firm of Mertinz & Griebens. Mr. Mertinz was a captain and Mr. Griebens was a soldier in the Austrian Army. They had a contract on which they were working West Indians. A complaint was made by the American Federation of Labor and the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate introduced a bill along the lines of the amendment proposed by my colleague the gentleman from Texas, and through a complaint of the American Federation of Labor the Senate Military Affairs Committee sent a subcommittee to Balboa Heights, Canal Zone, to conduct a hearing into the advisability of the passage of this bill and the conditions that prevailed in the Canal Zone.

During this time Mr. Philip B. Fleming, then Acting Deputy Administrator of P. W. A., and another deputy, flew to the Panama Canal and appeared at this hearing.

Among other things they had this to say about the wages paid by not only this firm of contractors, but others, and he placed in the record a letter he wrote to the Secretary of War after he made his investigation, and this is dated March 27, 1935:

The Division of Investigations has recently made a complete inspection and labor survey of all projects in the Canal Zone financed with P. W. A. funds. The majority of the reports of the special agents indicate a satisfactory condition in all respects except one. It was noticed that contractors were employing native artisans at the rate of 50 cents per hour, whereas these men are doing work which is classified as skilled under the original instructions.

On December 8, 1933, Major General McKinley dispatched the attached radiogram to the Canal Zone which was to establish wage rates. There are three classifications set out therein: (a) Skilled labor at $1.20 per hour; (b) semiskilled labor at 50 cents per hour, and (c) common labor at 30 cents per hour. It is the opinion of this office after several conferences on this matter that it would be unfair to require contractors to abide by the $1.20 rate for native artisans in view of the fact that our investigators state that the normal productivity of these men is not more than 33 percent of that of a skilled American workman.

I would suggest that General McKinley's radiogram, mentioned above, be amended to read in paragraph (b) to include the words "native artisan" in the 50-cent brackets.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 3 more minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOOD. Now, the artisans are the mechanics in the Panama Canal Zone. This firm, however, was employing native West Indies artisans and workmen, and they were paying below 30 cents an hour, and that is how the funds of the United States were spent in the construction work in the Panama Canal Zone, and there was not a single American working on this job of Mertinz & Griebens.

Therefore, I believe we should start with our War Department, especially, in weeding out these aliens who are employed now in supervisory capacities as experts and so on, and we should, by all means, require that the work performed by the artisans, mechanics, and experts on our war projects should be done by American citizens, and I certainly do hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM] may receive the unanimous approval of the Committee.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to now ask unanimous consent to submit a statement from the building and construction trades department, American Federation of Labor, which I ask that the Clerk may read, if there is no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the statement.

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

BUILDING AND CONSTRUCTION TRADES DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., February 29, 1940.

STATEMENT OF BUILDING TRADES DEPARTMENT OF THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR REGARDING THE AMENDMENT COVERING THE EMPLOYMENT OF AMERICAN CITIZENS ON THE PANAMA CANAL ZONE WHICH MR. LANHAM IS TO PROPOSE TO H. R. 7941

We earnestly appeal to the Members of the House to vote in favor of the amendment which has been offered by Congressman LANHAM, and which eliminates aliens above the grade of common laborer from civilian service on War Department activities to be carried on in the Canal Zone.

This amendment is effective January 1, 1941, and gives plenty of time for any necessary adjustments.

We understand that after W. C. Hushing, national chairman of the A. F. of L. legislative committee, appeared before the Appropriations Committee on this matter, that the committee agreed to the identical language in Mr. LANHAM's amendment, incorporated it in the bill and the report and forwarded it to the Government Printing Office. President Roosevelt learned of this action, intervened, and the bill was recalled from the Printing Office and the amendment stricken.

As representatives of all building trades affiliated to the American Federation of Labor, we sat in all conferences with Chairman Hushing which were held between the representatives of labor, the Secretary of War, Budget Director Smith, and other Government officers, and all concerned were in absolute agreement in regard to this proposal as set forth in H. R. 7941, which was passed by the House and which has been favorably reported in the Senate.

Before the introduction of this legislation, Secretary Woodring remained after a cabinet meeting was concluded and went over the proposal in detail with President Roosevelt, who gave it his absolute endorsement and with the understanding that none of the officials of the Government or the labor unions would advocate any amendment whatsoever.

After the House passed the legislation and after the Senate committee had favorably reported it to the Senate, Panamanians learned of this action and cabled their diplomatic representatives in Washington, who interviewed President Roosevelt, and as a result he reversed his position and notified the Secretary of War and Members of the Congress who are in charge of the legislation that he would insist on an amendment giving to Panamanians equal employment rights.

We regret this action of the President, because if agreements freely made between men do not stand up nothing else will. The President predicates his change of attitude on the treaty made by the Panamanians and the United States Government, which is found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of July 24, 1939.

Nowhere in the treaty itself is this agreement mentioned, but after the Panamanians had ratified the treaty there was an exchange of notes between the representatives of the two Governments giving to the Panamanians equal employment rights. This was simply a renewal of an understanding reached many years ago and carried in Executive orders of the President and the Secretary of War.

While the Panamanians have had equal employment rights on the zone for many years, they have not been employed because equal employment rights for them would and should carry the same vacation privileges Americans enjoy, the same commissary privileges the Americans enjoy, the same transportation privileges the Americans enjoy on the Panama Railroad and Panama Steamship Line, the same housing conditions, the same rates of pay, and all other perquisites enjoyed by Americans. These things are not enjoyed by the West Indian employees, and the average wage scale for them is approximately 25 cents per hour, although they are employed on all building trades, clerical work, as policemen, etc.

While the Panamanians had these equal employment rights, our American officials would not employ them to any great extent because they could get the West Indians cheaper. The excuse of the supervisors was, first, that the Panamanians did not speak English and, therefore, American supervisors could not direct them in their work. When the Panamanians made the teaching of English compulsory in their schools and a new generation grew up, they still were not employed, as the West Indian could still be employed at miserable wages.

If, however, the West Indian is eliminated, there will be equal opportunity for these Panamanians if they are given equal employment rights, and it will deprive American citizens of half of all positions covered in Mr. LANHAM's amendment.

The construction work that is to be done on the Panama Canal Zone is of a heavy nature, the new set of locks, etc. Panamanians have never worked on this class of work, and a most distressing situation will result if they are given equal employment rights, which means half the positions.

It will create a deplorable situation not only for the American workmen but for the contractors, as all large contracting firms capable of handling such projects have cordial relations with our organizations in the United States, and we have been advised by several of the very largest firms that they did not care to bid on these Canal Zone projects unless legislation similar to that now proposed is enacted, because their bids would be based on rates of pay and working conditions Americans enjoy while some other firms might base their bids upon rates of pay and conditions of the West Indians.

Another point is large contractors having the cordial relations spoken of above would not care to jeopardize the friendly cooperation now existing in the United States by going outside the country and being forced to do work under conditions which would jeopardize such relationships.

They also fully realize that it is necessary to have experienced, competent American workmen to do such work.

The President should not carry his good-neighbor policy to the extent he now proposes and deprive American skilled labor of half of these positions when the building trades, although conditions have improved, still have 25 percent of their members totally unemployed in the United States. Everyone knows that there are nine or ten million American people unemployed in the United States at present, and they should be given these employment opportunities on the Canal Zone and aliens should not be considered.

JOHN P. COYNE,
President, Building and Construction Trades Department, A. F. of L.

HERBERT RIVERS,
Secretary-Treasurer, Building and Construction Trades Department, A. F. of L.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. The questions that are involved in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM], whom I love to follow usually, are much more far-reaching and important than he really has understood, I fear. The questions that are involved there should be considered on the bill which has been introduced by the gentleman from Texas and referred to the proper legislative committee. I wonder how many in this House have been to the Panama Canal Zone. I have. I went there with an idea that we should have as many Americans there as possible, and I still have that idea, but gentlemen should remember that we are building in a foreign country. I wonder if gentlemen realize what the danger is in respect to sanitation, if in sending men there for whom homes have not been prepared, for whom hospitals have not been prepared, with conditions absolutely different from those that obtain in the United States, climatic conditions, entirely different, and who should have thrown around them if they go down there every protection for health and sanitation. Mr. Chairman, I would not subject the laborers of my section to what I fear would happen if we have not adequate provision for their care and protection. I am not talking about the dollars that are involved in the construction of these homes and hospitals and the placing of nurses and physicians there to take care of newcomers. Read, if you will, the evidence that was presented before my committee on a bill that will soon appear before the House if I can get the consent of the Rules Committee, for increased funds to the Americans who went down there in construction days when living conditions were bad. As a rule, living conditions are now very good, but it is by reason of hospitals to take care of those that are down there that they are good, and ample facilities to take care of the present population. You cannot provide those facilities at once. The argument of my friend itself shows that this is a proposal not to be handled on the floor by a committee amendment, but it is a proposal to be handled in the confines of a legislative committee, working out every problem in connection with it, and meeting every condition that may arise. I shall not undertake to defend the President of the United States from the letter of the American Federation of Labor. He needs no defense. His record should protect him from any attacks by labor.

Mr. WOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND. Yes.

Mr. WOOD. Did not a subcommittee of the Senate Military Affairs Committee hold an exhaustive hearing in Panama on the Sheppard bill?

Mr. BLAND. I do not know whether they did or not.

Mr. WOOD. They did; I tell the gentleman.

Mr. BLAND. This House has a right to have matters studied by its own committees, and passed upon by its own Members, with all due respect to those gentlemen. The contract that was referred to here was not a contract coming out of the funds for the Panama Canal Zone, but it was very distinct from that. The Navy Department has charge of construction for its work down there and the War Department has the construction of those works that are for military defense. You are dealing now with Panama Canal Zone funds, and dealing with men who have been there working from 1914, and before that time, up to the present. Let us approach the matter gradually, and sensibly, and reach a wise conclusion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LANHAM) there were—ayes 86, noes 23.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. The total amount used on an annual basis for administrative within-grade promotions for officers and employees under any appropriation or other fund made available in this act shall not exceed the amount determined by the Bureau of the Budget to be available for such purpose on the basis of the Budget estimate for such appropriation or fund exclusive of new money in any such Budget estimate for such administrative promotions.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VAN ZANDT: Page 15, after line 24, add a new section as follows:

"SEC. 3. No part of any appropriation contained in this act or authorized hereby to be expended shall be used to pay the compensation of any officer or employee of the Government of the United States, or of any agency the majority of the stock of which is owned by the Government of the United States, whose post of duty is in continental United States unless such person is a citizen of the United States, or a person in the service of the United States on the date of the approval of this act who being eligible for citizenship had theretofore filed a declaration of intention to become a citizen or who owes allegiance to the United States."

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I offer at this time is similar to the amendment adopted by the House some weeks ago with reference to the naval appropriation bills. Your attention is called to the fact that my amendment restricts the expenditure of the money appropriated for the nonmilitary functions of the War Department to only American citizens within the continental United States and does not apply to the Panama Canal Zone where there is employed the so-called "silver labor" group composed of native West Indians and Panamanians who are accustomed to climatic conditions that render it impossible for native Americans to follow such occupations.

By excluding aliens other than the above referred to group, the plight of the vast army of unemployed American citizens is being recognized by the Congress of the United States.

Why should the American people spend millions to help the unemployed and at the same time provide jobs for aliens through appropriations such as we are considering? Every single dollar appropriated by this Congress should be spent with a view to improving the position of our own American citizens, and by the adoption of this amendment Congress takes a step in that direction.

My colleagues, I earnestly exhort you to consider our 10,000,000 unemployed fellow Americans and respectfully request your favorable consideration of this amendment.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Surely.

Mr. SNYDER. As far as I am concerned, I will accept the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. VAN ZANDT. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEAVY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, just for a moment or two, I want to discuss the record of the hearings on this bill, insofar as it bears on the Bonneville project.

In the hearings, on page 126, the distinguished chairman of this subcommittee asked General Robbins if the $6,289,000, asked for Bonneville in the deficiency bill a day or two preceding the consideration of the Bonneville item here, was being used. Now, as a matter of fact, and as a matter of record, there never was a deficiency submitted for Bonneville in the sum of $6,289,000, nor in any other sum, during this year. Anyone reading the record would be under a misapprehension. I want to ask the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee if I am not correct in the statement that I now make?

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman is correct. It was a misprint. I had in mind the Boulder Dam project when that statement was made. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. LEAVY. As a result of that misapprehension, there was a limitation placed upon the Bonneville appropriation, which is found on page 10 of the bill.

Mr. SNYDER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I would not say as a result of that misapprehension that limitation was placed in the bill. I would not want to go on record as saying that.

Mr. LEAVY. Will the distinguished chairman say that the fact that such misapprehension did exist it became a factor leading to placing this limitation on the bill?

Mr. SNYDER. It might have been one of the factors.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEAVY. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. I would like to ask this question: Is it not a fact that according to the plans and specifications in constructing the various units, when we come to the time when units 5 and 6 are completed, that will really provide a retaining wall and foundations for units 7 and 8, and, as I understand it, it was not intended, in placing this limitation, to preclude that method of construction, which would be most economical and be in accordance with the plans and specifications?

Mr. LEAVY. It is my understanding that the situation is just as my colleague has explained it. If I am in error on that, I would like to have the chairman of this committee or some member of the committee correct me.

The Bonneville project is a project providing for 10 generating units, 2 of which have been installed, and all the power that is there generated is now sold, and there is a demand for additional power, and 4 more are being installed. There are still 4 that should be and can be installed. If a strict construction is placed upon this limitation of the $800,000, it would mean that when unit 6 is reached no provision whatever could be made for the ultimate construction of unit 7. It would mean that whenever the Government did see fit to construct unit 7, it would have to spend hundreds of thousands of dollars, because it was prohibited in the construction of unit 6 from taking into consideration the fact that there would be another unit. I am glad to know that the committee had no such thought when they wrote the limiting language in this bill.

Now, many skeptics have said, "You will never sell that Bonneville power." Why, Mr. Chairman, the Aluminum Co. of America in the last 60 days has contracted for $10,000,000 worth of Bonneville power over the next 20 years, and is building a $16,000,000 plant out near Vancouver, Wash., across the river from Portland. The California-Nevada Steel Co. in the last 2 weeks has made a contract for $5,000,000 worth of power. We cannot possibly supply the power that is now being asked for unless we proceed as rapidly as possible to carry through to completion all these units. It is a most short-sighted policy to delay finishing all 10 of these great generating units. This project will pay back from the 2 units out of the 10 units now in operation within the next year $2,200,000. Again I say, what a short-sighted policy it is to refuse now to permit construction of all the generating units and necessary transmission lines in order that the Government may recoup its investment there. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House, with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill, as amended, do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOEHNE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8668) making appropriations for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1941, for civil functions administered by the War Department, and for other purposes, directed him to report the same back to the House, with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a separate vote on the Van Zandt amendment.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on either of the other amendments? [After a pause.] If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the Van Zandt amendment.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. VAN ZANDT: Page 15, after line 24, add a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 3. No part of any appropriation contained in this act or authorized hereby to be expended shall be used to pay the compensation of any officer or employee of the Government of the United States, or of any agency the majority of the stock of which is owned by the Government of the United States, whose post of duty is in continental United States unless such person is a citizen of the United States, or a person in the service of the United States on the date of the approval of this act who being eligible for citizenship had theretofore filed a declaration of intention to become a citizen or who owes allegiance to the United States."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MARCANTONIO) there were—ayes 135, noes 3.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will be authorized to correct the section numbers of the bill.

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

There was no objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to extend their own remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

WATER-POLLUTION CONTROL

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 249.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 249

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 685, an act to create a Division of Water Pollution Control in the United States Public Health Service, and for other purposes. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 2 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and the ranking minority member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, the bill shall be read for amendments under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the same to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WIGGLESWORTH], and I yield myself 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, this is the rule on the so-called stream-pollution bill. This bill passed the Senate and was amended by the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House before reporting it here.

The rule provides for 2 hours of general debate and for the reading of the bill under the 5-minute rule. In other words, it is an open rule and the Members may have what opportunity they desire to offer additional amendments to the bill.

Mr. Speaker, the question of stream pollution is a very momentous one in this country at this time. The problem of the prevention of stream pollution is an ever-increasing one with the constant increase in the population of the country and the consequent increase in the pollution of our streams. There are two schools of thought as to how this problem should be met. There is that school of thought which believes that the proper solution to this problem is to start out immediately with a drastic Federal program to force, through the strong arm of the Federal Government, an immediate solution of the problem regardless of the consequences that might ensue. The other school of thought, that which prevailed in the reporting of this bill to the House, believes that this being a problem of such gigantic magnitude and such far-reaching effect should be approached in a careful, studious, cooperative, and helpful manner rather than reaching the strong arm of the Federal Government out and forcing the solution in that manner.

This bill, as I say, is fostered by the latter school of thought. I am sure that those of us who are interested—and we are all interested—in this great problem can appreciate that if the strong arm of the Federal Government were sought in the immediate solution of the problem many evils might result. For instance, in practically every congressional district of this great country we have large industries that have grown up, and great metropolitan centers, with an ever-increasing use of the streams for the disposal of sewage and refuse from these industries. Now, to swoop down with one fell play by a drastic law and say to these industries and these great metropolitan centers this thing must subside within a comparatively short time or drastic penalties will ensue would likely bring about havoc to our economic and social life.

Mr. DINGELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLMER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DINGELL. I would like to know how long industries need to adjust themselves. I understand the bill to be considered provides for a substantial amount of latitude in order for industsy to adjust itself. Can the gentleman tell me, after 100 years of industrial expansion, how much longer industry is going to take to adjust itself and will industry ever adjust itself unless the strong arm of the Government makes it do so? There are many questions that might be asked in connection with this matter. Industries have the right to use water from these streams, but they have no right to dump pollution and sewage into these streams, thereby destroying fish, wildlife, and game. Will the gentleman answer my question as to how long industry ought to have to adjust itself?

Mr. COLMER. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has asked so many questions that it would be difficult to answer all of them.

Mr. DINGELL. Just answer the one.

Mr. COLMER. Not being a seer, of course, I could not answer the gentleman's question as to how long it will take. The only way I can answer is to say that those who sponsor this legislation feel that the better solution of the problem is in cooperation rather than in drastic force and action. How long it will take no one knows. But we do know that progress is being made. I know that the gentleman from Michigan, who has many great industries in his district and his State and thousands upon thousands of men employed in those industries, would not want to run the chance of having some drastic action taken that would close down those industries and throw his people out of work.

Mr. DINGELL. They need not close down.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLMER. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. CARTER. I listened to all the testimony given before the Rivers and Harbors Committee in reference to pollution. This testimony was given last year. I want to assure my friend from Michigan that very rapid strides are being made at the present time in connection with the solving of the pollution problem. That was the testimony of gentlemen from various States when they appeared before this committee, and they came from a very wide area. This problem is being solved, in my humble opinion, and can be solved without the necessity of any legislation but by merely leaving it entirely in the hands of the States.

Mr. COLMER. I am grateful to the gentleman from California, who has given much thought to this subject.

Mr. DONDERO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLMER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DONDERO. The testimony before our committee showed that the public was the great offender in the pollution of our waters. The testimony further showed that 60 percent of our sewage problem thus far has been corrected. In other words, we are making great progress.

Mr. DINGELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLMER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. DINGELL. Much of this correction has been due to the Public Works Administration advancing money to municipalities for the purpose of creating sewage-disposal plants throughout the entire United States; but industry has been very, very slow, and frequently unwilling to cooperate. I have flown over the terrain of Pennsylvania and other States. The streams and rivers are veritable canals and depositories for mine and industrial sewage and deadly refuse that has been dumped there for a half century or more. In spite of the pleadings of sportsmen, game conservationists, and others, no effort has been made by the culprits to correct the situation. It is time that something drastic be done to force correction of the situation.

Mr. COLMER. I may say to the gentleman, who evidently belongs to that school of thought which believes that the proper method of approach is by drastic action, and of course I hope he will have opportunity to express himself more fully in general debate, that this bill sets up a board—a Division of Water Pollution Control—under the Public Health Department.

The bill proposes to establish a Division of Water Pollution Control in the United States Public Health Service, which will, in cooperation with the Chief of Engineers of the War Department and other Federal agencies and the States, make surveys and prepare plans for improving the sanitary conditions of the navigable waters of the United States and streams tributary thereto by eliminating or reducing discharge of sewage, industrial waste, and other substances into said water.

This bill, however, does not set up a new bureau but rather utilizes existing facilities of the Department of Public Health, the War Department, the Chief of Army Engineers, and so on. In other words, we are not setting up a new bureau but using the existing facilities for this purpose. In a word, the bill provides for the study and development, and the eventual solution of this pollution problem.

It does not authorize enormous amounts of money to be expended from the Public Treasury but, on the contrary, provides that the municipalities, the industries, and so on may secure loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Those of us who have given this bill some thought believe that this is the sane and proper approach to a solution of the problem, and I may say as a member of the Rivers and Harbors Committee for some 4 or 5 years I have given it considerable thought; it has the approval of the Department of Public Health, the Surgeon General, and it has the approval, I may say, of everybody who has been consulted about this problem, with the possible exception of the officers of the Biological Survey.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLMER. I am happy to yield further to the gentleman from California.

Mr. CARTER. I understood the gentleman to say that this bill has the approval of the Surgeon General.

Mr. COLMER. Quite so.

Mr. CARTER. Does not the gentleman know the Surgeon General is made a czar under this bill, and, of course, he is going to approve a bill of that kind?

Mr. COLMER. I did not understand that the Surgeon General had been made a czar under it, I will say to my friend, who ordinarily is rather conservative in his statements, but I do understand that it is necessary for someone to be at the head of this Board, and those who in their wisdom have set up this legislation have preferred to use the services of the head of an existing department of the Government rather than set up a new agency, which, I am sure, my distinguished friend from the left side of the aisle would oppose. I would rather have thought that in the interest of economy he would have looked with approval on the use of the Surgeon General, who is already being paid by the Government.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLMER. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.
